Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this bill for a number of reasons, but there are three in particular which I shall mention:

First. I believe it to be absolutely unconstitutional and takes from the State its police power, which is practically the last vestige of State rights remaining.

Second. It will accomplish no good, will not prevent mob action, but, on the contrary, will have a tendency to increase the number of those crimes which cause lynching.

Third. It will establish a supergovernment throughout this Union, which the Negro will conclude has been established solely in his interest.

I shall not enter upon the constitutionality of the bill, because, in the first place, I believe it to be so absolutely apparent that discussion is unnecessary, and its constitutionality has been debated by able Representatives and constitutional lawyers on the floor of the House. I am sorry, however, in this connection that the Attorney General's office was called into the hearing. It is regrettable that it had its authorities and discussions so absolutely selected and arranged as to argue upon one side without the consideration of the other at all, and then to indicate that whether the bill is constitutional or not it would be well to put it up to the Supreme Court, showing conclusively the partisan consideration of it by the Department of Justice, when it should have been considered impartially and without regard to politics.

We have for years been drifting too much to Federal control in State affairs and there is but little independent State action remaining save the police power, which is still retained almost wholly by the States, with the exception of that group of men who are traveling the country in an endeavor to enforce what is known as the Volstead Act under the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. It has been well said that if Congress can validly make this kind of offense a Federal crime, there is no felony or misdemeanor known to the laws of any State which can not be made a Federal crime and impose upon the Federal authority for detection, protection, and punishment. If, then, there should remain any vestige of police power and reserve rights of the States they could also be centralized until nothing remained but the mere name of State's rights; in fact, when the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and in charge of this bill, was questioned by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], Mr. VOLSTEAD admits that it is his view that if a State does not punish a man for committing a crime, whatever it is and wherever it is, the National Government has the power to do it under act of Congress, if it be maintained that the State had not used due diligence or asserted its power to prevent the crime or to apprehend the offenders.

Note you that the same judge who is to determine the case has jurisdiction over the question as to whether the State has exercised due diligence in the prosecution and punishment for the crime committed. If this be the view of the chairman of the committee, then under that construction of the Constitution certainly all power will have been diverted from the States and centralized in the National Government—the very situation which the framers of our Constitution protested against and endeavored to prevent by the use of all available language in the drafting of the Constitution and its amendments. Allusions have been made to the laws of England upon this subject, but the fact is overlooked that Parliament enacts all legislation for England, and there is no dual government like that of the United States where all powers not conveyed by the Constitution to the National Government are reserved to the States.

I am as deeply opposed to lynchings as any Member of this House. It is degrading to civilized people. No good citizen approves of lynchings or mob violence under any condition, and every Member of Congress is diametrically opposed to such infractions of the law. I do not believe, however, that any good can be accomplished by this bill. It is in thought sectional and aimed at the Southland. I am proud, however, of the fact that some Members on the Republican side are opposed to the measure. I believe the Negro population of our country was awakening to the fact that the protestations of friendship and love by the Republican Party for the Negro were not sincere except at the time of voting. When offices were to be bestowed or special privileges granted, for which the Republican Party is so noted, they were not given to the colored voters who helped to swell the Republican vote. The Negro had begun to realize what he had been told for so many years—i. e., that the white people of the South were his best friends, and after disappointment for lo these many years he was beginning to observe and to vote accordingly, or not to vote at all. The Republican Party is therefore endeavoring to placate this feeling among this large class of its voters.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], with a large colored vote in his district, rushes into the arena, introduces this bill, with the desire to again procure the solid colored vote for the Republican Party. I am convinced that those supporting the bill do not believe it will ever become a law, or if it is passed they do not believe it will stand the constitutional test. They have added a provision which declares that if any portion is decided to be unconstitutional it shall not affect the rest of the act. What if it does not become a law or, if it does, is declared to be unconstitutional? Yet Mr. DYER and his associates can claim they did what they could, and that is all they care for. It is political pure and simple, and I believe will prove a boomerang to those who so insistently demand its passage. If this were all the damage it could do, we might feel somewhat consoled, but it will establish in the minds of the colored population a belief that the National Government has taken them under special care and protection, that they are immune from State law and are subject to prosecution for the crime mentioned by the National Government alone. I have no doubt but what some Republican statesman, in meeting assembled, with his strong right arm extended, will declare that the great Government at Washington has taken his colored brethren under its special care and protection, and that no longer will he be subject to the laws of the State under which he has been reared, educated, and lived. This will not suppress lynching, but will create race strife, race conflict, race riots, and lawlessness throughout those sections where vast numbers of the colored population live.

I say the Republican Party recognizes that the colored voters are awakening to the insincerity and hypocrisy of its leaders and are enacting this measure as a sop to appease them. They are doing more than this. They are trying to regain them by the offer of appointments to Federal offices. In Maryland they have appealed to President Harding, by letter dated December 13 last, for their appointment. He is urged to put Negroes in office. The situation in the State is declared acute; a substantial recognition for them is requested. The letter was signed by Senators O. E. WELLER and JOSEPH I. FRANCE, Representatives FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN, SYDNEY E. MUDD, JOHN PHILIP HILL, and A. A. BLAKENEY, State Chairman Galen L. Tait, and National Committeeman William P. Jackson. I insert the letter:

BALTIMORE, MD., December 13, 1921.

Hon. WARREN G. HARDING,
The White House, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The Republican organization of Maryland is deeply concerned to secure recognition for its colored Republican members by presidential appointment to Federal office.

The well-being of our party in Maryland—its continued advance or retrogression—is largely contingent upon receiving such visible token of recognition for an important constituent element.

An acute situation confronts us. Its gravity was manifested in the candidacy of a colored Republican for United States Senator last year, and an aftereffect was noted in the 1921 election just passed.

The foremost necessity for party recognition of the colored voter in the United States is in Maryland. The following are reasons:

1. About 90,000 colored Republicans of both sexes are now registered in Maryland, approximately 40 per cent of the total Republican registration.

2. Maryland has the largest colored Republican voting strength of any State where colored people actually vote without hindrance and where their support is essential to success. Three desperate attempts to destroy the colored vote by State constitutional disenfranchisement amendments have been heretofore made and defeated.

GIVES RESULTS IN STATE.

3. (a) In 1913 all six Congressmen and both United States Senators from Maryland were Democrats. (b) In 1914 we elected one Congressman. (c) In 1916 we elected two Congressmen and a United States Senator. (d) In 1917 we controlled the legislature on joint ballot, elected a State treasurer, and enacted a party program of legislation. (e) In 1918 we elected three Congressmen, gaining one. (f) In 1919 we came within 165 votes of electing a governor and did elect an attorney general. (g) In 1920 we elected four Congressmen and a second United States Senator, giving us both Senators and four out of the six Congressmen; also carrying the State for Harding and Coolidge by 55,000.

These successive advances prove that Maryland is the only Southern State with a well-organized and active Republican Party. The cheerful and loyal adherence of the colored element has been and is essential to its maintenance and progress.

4. We also call attention to Maryland's Republican national record for 30 years. With every Republican national victory Maryland has gone Republican or split its electoral vote (viz, 1896, 1900, 1904, 1908, 1920) and has elected all Democratic State electors only in the years of national Democratic successes (viz, 1892, 1912, and 1916).

Mr. President, is it logical to attempt to gain States far to the South on the enemy's rear if proper measures are not taken to hold and consolidate the successive gains made by us along the real firing line on the border in Maryland.

SIGNERS ARE DESCRIBED.

The undersigned are members of the Maryland conference, consisting of the national committeeman, State chairman, two United States Senators, and four Congressmen, whose recommendations on Federal appointments have been heretofore received by you, including the request made by us for recognition of colored Maryland Republicans.

An interview with Mr. John T. Adams, chairman of the Republican national committee, was had recently by Senator Weller and State Chairman Tait in behalf of the undersigned on this subject, and Mr. Adams advised that the matter be presented to you.

We therefore feel it our duty officially as representing our party, including its colored members, and each of us personally, to again earnestly urge and appeal to you to grant substantial recognition through presidential appointments of the loyal Republicans of Maryland.

Note that they allege that the well-being of their party in Maryland and its continued advance or retrogression is largely contingent upon such visible token of recognition. Note also in paragraph 1 that they allege 90,000 colored Republicans of both sexes are registered, and that this constitutes 40 per cent of their total registration; in other words, Maryland to-day is represented in the United States Senate and by four Members of this House by 40 per cent of colored votes. Is it not time that the people of our State should awaken to the conditions mentioned in the letter of those distinguished gentlemen?

I wish also to say that since the writing of this letter some five white officeholders have been ousted from the Internal Revenue Service in Baltimore and five colored Republicans appointed to fill their places.

Lynching is rapidly decreasing, and the method to further accentuate this decrease is to my mind by education to eliminate the crime, which causes such outbursts of passion and hatred of the mob. In this work the cooperation of the Negro is absolutely essential. The vast number of our Negro population is just as much opposed to the outrages which are committed as are the white people themselves. In my State they are almost wholly a law-abiding people, and have practically eliminated the crime and its effect—lynching.

It must not be thought, however, that no progress is being made in eliminating lynching in this country. The average number lynched for the first 16 years since 1899 was over 128—the average for the last 16 years has been 65. The largest number lynched during the 16 years from 1889 was 208, in 1892, while for the last 16 years the largest number has been 83. Gradually the States supported by public sentiment and enriched by higher education have improved conditions. Lynching has decreased 50 per cent in the past 20 years. When you realize that lynching has decreased 50 per cent and other criminal affairs in the United States district courts have increased over 80 per cent during the last 10 years, that over 9,000 homicides are now being committed in the United States, that a wave of murder, highway robbery, and grosser crimes have been sweeping over the country, it would seem that we should also bend our energies to the elimination of these evils.

The passage of such an act will establish a supergovernment throughout the Union. It will extend Federal control over all the constables, marshals, sheriffs, States' attorneys, and even the governor of every State in the Union. It proposes to control and punish county and State officials wherever situate, and yet not pay one dollar of their salary for duties performed. This vast army of elected or appointed officials of any State are to be investigated by Federal agents, prosecuted by Federal agents, tried by Federal judges, and face confinement in Federal prisons if it be the decision of the judge.

The police power of the great city of Baltimore, the metropolis of the Southland, will be absolutely subject to the dictation of the Federal Government. If any official on that force should neglect his duty, it would be determined by the Federal judge that the State has not used due diligence in the apprehension and punishment of the mob, which may consist of five or more people; the State authorities may be punished by the Federal judge, who also would judge as to whether or not the State has used due diligence.

Under this bill a State or municipal official charged with the duty, or who possesses the power or authority as such official to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, and neglects, in the opinion of the Federal judge, to make reasonable effort, or any person participating in a mob causing death of prisoner, may be imprisoned for five years or pay a fine not exceeding $5,000, or both. Any county in which a person is put to death by a mob shall forfeit $10,000, which sum may be recovered for the use of the family. If such forfeiture is not paid by the county upon recovery of a judgment therefor, the court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment by execution upon any property of the county, or may cause, levy, and taxation therefor. Therefore a county of 10,000 people may be sleeping soundly in their beds, a crime may be committed, and five men who, perhaps, beheld the assailant in his criminal assault may apprehend him, lynch him, and yet that county is subject to $10,000 fine, and the people are compelled to pay it by taxation. They absolutely deplore the occurrence, have had nothing to do with it, the county may be the most orderly in the country, and yet be subject to this fine.

I can not imagine any bill more drastic and fraught with so many dangers as this. Certainly the wildest imagination of those fathers of our country who believed in a central Government could have imagined anything of a more centralizing nature than this proposed act.

I can not believe that in the final analysis the party now in power will barter the sovereign rights of 48 independent States for political preferment, and if they do, I have an abiding faith that the Supreme Court of the land will not allow such absolute disregard of the powers reserved by the States under the Constitution.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration should pass the House. It is intended to apply to every State and community.

Our Government, under a Constitution and laws, has provided for a trial and punishment for the commission of all crimes and misdemeanors, and every citizen under the Constitution and laws is entitled to a fair and impartial trial. If he be innocent, he should be acquitted under this law. If he be guilty, he should be punished as provided by law.

Mob law has no place in American institutions, and has no place in civilized society. The report that more than 3,000 persons have been lynched in the United States is a reflection upon our civilization.

Everyone who has spoken upon this bill has denounced the mob and mob law, and it is the unanimous opinion that lynching is a crime and a blot upon civilized society.

Our friends on the other side of the House, however, who openly denounce the mob and mob law do not approve of the method suggested in this bill to stop it. In fact, they apparently do not approve of any method by our Government to assist in blotting out this crime. They claim that any effort on the part of our Government to interfere is unconstitutional, and they raise their hands in holy horror that our Government should attempt to interfere in the punishment of this crime in the various States. Now if you really want to stop lynching pass this bill.

You will recall a few years ago when this same argument was directed with equal force against the national child labor bill then under consideration in the House. The bill passed the House, however, and became the law of the land, and has been of great benefit to our people. At the time this bill was unmercifully denounced as unconstitutional and interfering with the rights of the State.

The constitutional question involved in that bill was the same as the question involved in the Dyer antilynching bill.

The constitutional authority of Congress to pass the bill under consideration, it seems to me, was clearly set forth by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] in the citation of the case of Ex parte Virginia, and I quote from this opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States the following:

> A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever by virtue of public position under a State government deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.

Lynching has been tolerated in the United States already too long. The time has arrived when it must cease. It is plain to all that it will not cease without the use of the strong arm of the Federal Government.

I earnestly hope this bill may pass, and it should receive the unanimous sanction of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it has been very difficult for me to bring my mind to the support of this measure. Brought up in a school of political philosophy which draws a very distinct line of demarcation between Federal and State functions, I have found it difficult to assent to the invasion of State sovereignty which in some degree it will inevitably entail. But my respect for State sovereignty is necessarily bounded by the limitation that States must respect the Constitution of the United States.

I do not propose to consider the question before us from a racial standpoint. It is not a race question. Having lived in the South, it is difficult to assent to the proposition that the Negro in that section is as harshly treated as is so often represented. In my experience I have found our southern brothers and their colored neighbors living together in peace and amity. There has been, and I believe there still is, the greatest good will among them.

The occasional outbursts of indignation against the most heinous of all human offenses can not help but be looked upon with indulgence by any man who has the red blood of true manhood coursing through his veins. But while abhorring the crime and despising the criminal, we can not help but perceive the manifest dangers of trial by a mob instead of by a judge and jury.

We can not help but perceive the pitfalls of mistaken identity and the inherent unfairness of trying any man, whatever the charge against him, without giving him the opportunity to appear before the regularly constituted courts of our country protected by all of the safeguards provided by our Constitution, of being confronted with the witnesses against him, having the opportunity to procure witnesses in his own defense, the aid of counsel and a fair trial by a jury of his peers.

We can not help but feel that every instance of lynching demoralizes the participants, lessens their respect for law and order, and opens the pathway to a repetition of such summary measures of punishment where the provocation may not be so grave or tormenting.

Two wrongs can not make for right, and whatever the provocation the first duty of the citizen is respect for the laws of his country, which are, as they ought to be, predominant and superior to the laws of the jungle.

When a mob gathers in order to inflict condign punishment upon a criminal in any community the perpetrators of this form of justice do not ride with masks, but in the open daylight, followed by a crowd of admiring men, women, and children. What a baleful influence must that necessarily exert upon the moral fiber and stamina of the community.

I think that it is a fatal error on the part of my colleagues on this side of the aisle to take a stand in opposition to this measure. I know, of course, that it is not their desire to stand as defenders of lynching. That is sufficiently denied here upon the floor by every man who has spoken against this measure. They do not believe in lynching, but the misfortune is that they do not believe in stopping it. I think also that my friends on this side of the aisle are rather too sensitive to the implications contained in this measure. They consider it as a blow at the South. It may affect the South in greater degree—that is, in the number of cases involved—but the truth is that lynching has become a national habit and has permeated every State in the Union with the exception of six. I am sorry to say that the names of the six States on the honor roll do not include my own. The States with a perfectly clean record in upholding the law are Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and Utah. The bill therefore is not directed at the South. It can not even be said that it is especially intended for the protection of the colored men of the South, because lynching has gotten to be such a habit that white men are lynched, and it can not be said that lynching is resorted to only in cases of rape and crimes against womanhood for only 20 per cent of the three thousand and odd cases in the last 30 years were for such crimes.

The rest were for various other offenses; and there, gentlemen, is the danger. You may talk as you please of these atrocious crimes and present harrowing pictures of women wallowing in their blood after assaults of this character, but that is not relevant nor convincing. Once indulge the passion for the gravest crime and you open the door to the usurpation of that authority by mobs for lesser offenses which may happen to arouse their indignation.

I am glad to see that many southern papers take an indulgent attitude toward this bill, that they are not so sensitive or so high strung as are many of my colleagues. They are the Atlanta Constitution, of Georgia; the Jacksonville Times-Union, of Florida; the Albany Herald, of Georgia; the San Antonio Express, of Texas; the Dallas Morning News, of Texas; the Dallas Journal, of Texas; the Bristol Courier, of Virginia; the Chattanooga Times, of Tennessee; the Elizabeth City Independent, of North Carolina; the Greensboro Daily News, of North Carolina. When southern papers of the standing of these take a friendly view toward this measure I question whether my colleagues are echoing the intelligent, sane sentiment of their constituency in opposing this step toward the enforcement of law and order, and I question very seriously the wisdom of their attitude in trying to ingraft such ideas into the structure of the Democratic Party. To make opposition to this legislation the test of loyalty to Democratic principles would be "the most unkindest cut of all," and perhaps the most futile and ill-considered act of party leadership in the past 30 years. I warn you that Democrats of the North can not be dragoned into such policies.

Democracy need make no compromise with race prejudice. If you want to detroy the Democratic Party in the North just hitch up with such reactionary policies and the deed is done. The Civil War is over, and Copperheadism is as dead as Vallandingham.

I venture to suggest to my friends on this side of the aisle that the best policy to pursue is to get in line behind the Constitution and support the fourteenth amendment with the same enthusiasm that you have manifested in the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment.

The prolonged argument on this bill has actually degenerated into a quasiconstitutional defense of the inalienable right to resort to lynch law.

It is marvelous how keen we become in the interpretation of the Constitution when some impending law threatens to tread on our prejudices.

I was somewhat inclined that way myself when the Volstead Enforcement Act was before the House, and I notice that the men who are now conspicuous in shouting for States rights and the sacred police power of the sovereign States were very willing at that time to surrender all their cherished rights to the Federal Government. I warned my friends at the time of what they were inviting, in a speech on this floor, but the warning fell on deaf ears.

The crucial point really seems to be: "Whose ox is gored."

They surrendered their police power then, and the Supreme Court of the United States has ratified their act, so that now there is not enough left of the police power of the States to put through the eye of a needle.

We ought not to refrain from exercising our prerogatives as a legislative body simply because the charge of unconstitutionality is flaunted before our eyes. This is the easiest criticism to urge and the hardest to answer before the issue is adjudicated. Even though the criticism had a modicum of merit, the wisest course is to proceed with the legislation and leave the issue to be contested before the proper tribunal by those who were willing to put their prophetic powers to the test.

The protection of the law means security and the burden is thus imposed upon the individual States to make and enforce laws to render life and liberty and property secure. To secure these objects, the mere enactment of laws purporting to protect the citizen in these fundamental rights is not sufficient unless they are enforced; so that enforcement of the laws is even more vitally essential than the passage of such laws.

LAW AND ENFORCEMENT GO TOGETHER.

But what I am most solicitous about is the answerability of our Nation to other Governments in cases where its nationals are abused or murdered by mob frenzy. There have been such cases, you know, and the Federal Government has had to stand in the pitiable situation of admitting its powerlessness over the States.

Either we are a nation or a loose confederacy or an association of nations.

It is in effect now, maintained by our hypercritical experts:

1. That the States are doing their best to abolish the practice.

2. That even though they fail, the Federal Government has no interest in the matter.

Therefore the Federal Government has no right to interfere.

I shall show that both of the premises upon which this conclusion has been reached are fallacious.

As to the first premise:

There were 63 lynchings last year. The States where they occurred were evidently impotent to prevent them. Further than that, they made no attempt to apprehend or punish the lynchers.

The perpetrators of these brutal and barbarous crimes carried on their inhuman practices unmasked, often boldly in the broad daylight, with no attempt to conceal their purpose, their persons, or their proceedings.

The participants were even applauded in their respective communities. They were held up as heroes, upholders of the chastity of womanhood and of white supremacy.

Without the spur of popular disapproval there was no incentive to punish them and any district attorney or prosecuting officer who ventured the task would be the most unpopular man in his community. If he performed his sworn duty he would never be reelected and would sink into obloquy and obscurity. Under such circumstances it is mere trifling with our intelligence to say that the States addicted to this vicious practice are doing the best they can. They can never assert that they are doing the best they can until the communities disgraced by this scourge are educated to the honest conviction that the man or men who take the law in their own hands, even for the most laudable of human impulses, are guilty of an unpardonable crime against law and order which are the most cherished of the institutions of our country.

As to the premise, upon which so much emphasis is laid, that even though the States fail in their duty to abolish lynching the Federal Government has no interest in the matter, I wish to submit these observations:

First, the Federal Government is the Government of a nation. It is under the obligation to protect its citizens in those inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness promulgated in our Declaration of Independence, and which, even earlier than that, were foreshadowed in Magna Charta, where we find them expressed in these words:

To none will we sell, to none deny or delay, right or justice.

So deeply were these words embedded in our traditions that the very first Congress held after the adoption of the Federal Constitution proposed to the legislatures of the various States the first 10 amendments, which have become generally known as the American Bill of Rights.

It is more profitable to study these basic principles than to attempt an analysis or comparison of conflicting judicial decisions, which, after the most tedious research, only establish one point, namely, that Federal offenses are triable by Federal courts. And that is practically what we would expect; so that our inquiry only leads us back to where we started. The real point is: What offenses may be made a Federal crime? Is it not obvious that any offense that flouts the National Constitution is per se a subject of Federal legislation? Of what value are the guaranties of the Constitution unless Congress has and asserts that power?

We are controlled by the Federal Constitution. Where that forbids a State to do or not to do certain things Congress clearly has the power to enforce such provisions by appropriate legislation. The sole question is whether, where the Federal Constitution forbids an individual to do or not to do certain things, Congress likewise has the power to provide for enforcement.

The question raised in this debate hinges on the fact that in the fourteenth amendment the prohibition as to interference with life, liberty, and property is directed against the State and not against the individual. Therefore, it is agreed that if an individual or individuals trangress those rights, the offense is one to be handled by the police power of the States in the courts of the States and not by Federal officers in Federal courts. No one can dispute that. But on the other hand, it can not be reasonably doubted that if the States deprive an individual of life, liberty, or property, the offense is properly a subject of congressional action and by proper legislation may be made the subject of trial in the Federal tribunals.

This is precisely what is done in this bill. It appearing that States do not properly protect the citizen in his constitutional guaranties of life, liberty, and property, Congress proposes in this measure to impose certain penalties on the States offending. In so far therefore as this measure punishes the State, no voice can be justly raised against it. The bulk of the opposition is based on those paragraphs in the bill where provision is made for the punishment of individuals who participate in mobs or actively conduct the lynching. Participants (lookers-on) as well as actual executioners are stamped with infamy and made amenable to punishment.

While these paragraphs of the bill have my hearty moral support I believe that they can not, in view of the decisions, be justified by the fourteenth amendment. They can, however, be amply justified by the fifth and sixth amendments, to which in this debate, no attention seems to have been given.

The fifth amendment merits our attention now, because among the rights guaranteed to all persons in the land are these:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury—

And so forth.

This is one of the guaranties which individual lynchers violate. Then there is also this further guaranty:

No person * * * shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Here, you will notice, is no interdiction as to the State, nor limitation of any kind. The language is, "No person shall be deprived" of the rights in question. Inferentially, then, they shall not be deprived of their rights either by the State or by individuals.

The sixth amendment to the Constitution reads:

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury * * * and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Where are these rights ever known to be accorded to the victim of a lynching party? If they are not, the State is justly entitled to bear the blame. It has the duty imposed upon it to provide a safe place for the incarceration of its prisoners.

It has the duty imposed upon it to employ sufficient guards, men who will lay down their lives if necessary, to protect their charges.

If the State fails in these duties, it is justly chargeable with responsibility under the fourteenth amendment. But since the courts have construed this amendment so as to shift the responsibility from the State to the individual offending, there is no recourse now for Congress but to accept the invitation contained in the fourteenth amendment and enforce, "by appropriate legislation," the guaranty in question, making it certain, beyond peradventure, that States shall not escape their just responsibility by winking at and throwing the blame on the individual. That is the gap in the law that must be stopped.

"But, oh," it is said, "the Federal Government can not go into the various States and punish men for murder." Of course not. The Federal Government would not go into the States to punish for murder; they would go in to punish lynching. Lynching is not murder. It may involve murder, but it is more than murder. It is defiance of the law. If we were to punish a man under this proposed law for usurping the roll of executioner at a lynching bee, the indictment would not be for manslaughter, it would be based on his defiance of the United States Constitution under the terms of the law thus provided for its enforcement.

The right to lynch is no more nor less than the assertion of the right to usurp the functions of government and to nullify every guaranty embedded in our National Constitution for the preservation of civilized society. It creates for the time being a supergovernment under which all constitutional safeguards are cast aside and the recognized, duly elected, or appointed officers of the law are flouted, insulted, and ignored. This is the empire within an empire set up by night riders and Ku-Klux regulators. It has no limit, and may, as often, be resorted to to revenge a private score as to punish an actual offender. It is a dangerous menace to our country.

The lynching spirit is doubtless responsible for the inception, revival, and growth of the Ku-Klux Klan. It would seem that the men who take delight in that sort of regulating were anxious to give an atmosphere of sanctity to their viciousness. They hypocritically based their ritual on respect for the American Constitution and for the flag which they dishonor. Another pretense is solicitude for the protection of female honor, although only 20 per cent of the recorded lynchings are traceable to crimes of that nature.

No man can be a citizen of this secret, invisible empire and be a good citizen of the American Republic, for, though he may pretend allegiance and great love for America, his professions are utterly negatived by the indirect, but nevertheless clear, implication that the citizens of this secret empire have no confidence in the American Constitution or in the established laws to punish crime, protect persons or property, or otherwise achieve good government. The very existence of this empire is, therefore, a direct impeachment of the wisdom, the virtue, and the adequacy of American institutions and laws.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, of course, it is impossible to fully discuss this question in the time allotted to me. Up until the last speech this has been a real debate, and I do not know that I can add much to what has already been said. It has been a debate involving constitutional questions. But the last speech was by all odds a speech on a very much lower plane than that on which the debate has heretofore been pitched. [Applause.] It was filled with gratuitous insults upon the South and southern people. He knows nothing about the question. That was evident from his remarks. Of course, we all know that his remarks are made for home consumption and to capture a few Negro votes. But this speech was a departure from the rule in this debate. Those who are opposed to the passage of this bill have conducted a real debate. The speeches are illuminating and convincing.

But I have been struck with one thing about this debate. I have not heard one single human being who advocated this bill express one particle of sympathy for the victim who suffers most in the event of lynching for the crime of rape. Not one particle of sympathy seems to have gone out for the people who have suffered more pangs of pain than the brute who has been mobbed.

I want to say to the gentleman who has just taken his seat that there is less race prejudice in the South against the Negro than there is in his own country. But I want to say to him and to you that it is race knowledge and not race prejudice. Go into San Francisco and if a Chinaman goes into the Palace Hotel there is a race riot. "Get out of here; we won't stop with a Chinaman." That is your race problem in San Francisco. Down in New Orleans if a Chinaman goes to stop at a hotel there would be nothing but a little curiosity, but you let a Negro go into the St. Charles Hotel, and you have immediately a race riot. It is race knowledge and not race prejudice.

Now, I know that there is not a man on this floor who has among the Negroes acquainted with him more friends than I have. I work them on a little plantation which I own. All these Negroes are my friends. But I will tell you what I do not want; I will tell you what I am not going to have; I will tell you what every good white man on this earth will not have—I do not want him as a son-in-law and I do not want her as a daughter-in-law. [Applause.] Not one of you who will vote for this bill would be proud of a Negro grandchild. No; you hang you heads in shame even at the thought of it.

Any man who gets up on the floor of this House and endeavors to play national politics with this question is not sincere; not one of you will rise up in your seats and deny that proposition. The man who does it is a common enemy to the white race. Sir Benjamin Kidd, in his history of Social Evolution, says it is implanted in the heart and mind of the Anglo-Saxon, the Scandinavian, and, in fact, the entire white race to preserve the purity and integrity of its blood, and that is God-given knowledge and not prejudice. It is implanted there for the preservation of the best of the race, if it is to survive. There is no nation in the world that has ever grown to a first place that has not maintained this rule. Every nation that has departed from it has decayed and died. We of the South are fighting the battles of the white man. You who are supporting this bill are traitors to the white race. We are fighting to prevent the destruction of our white civilization. You who vote for this bill are destroying our white civilization. If this Republican side were filled up with good white women from the North, there would not be a vote in favor of this bill. You who vote for this bill are selling your white birthright for a mess of black political pottage.

Now, I do not care how much you legislate, you can never do any good by this kind of legislation. You will not save the life of a single rapist, but will cause many rapes to be committed. There never was a more cruel, there never was a more false, there never was a more heartless piece of legislation attempted to be forced upon the people—that is, the good people of both races. In the first place, if you go into the Federal court you have got to take your jury from the intelligent people of the State, and the same people that enforce one law will enforce the other. Not only that, if you are worthy of being white men, if you are worthy of that magnificent ancestry of yours, there is not one of you who will go home to your wife and children and say that you believe in social equality. You would not do it, and you know you would not. No; not one of you will go back to your white constituents and say, "I am proud of my vote on the anti-lynching bill." If you are not ashamed of it you ought to be.

Mr. Chairman, the proponents of this bill have made a poor showing in the debate from a lawyer's point of view. If their speeches represent the view of their constituents, then our Constitution has indeed fallen in the estimation of the people, and that instrument which our fathers held to be almost sacred has now no friends. Mr. Gladstone thought this instrument was the greatest state paper of all time and said that it was the greatest state paper ever struck off by a body of men. Oh, gentlemen, it is the palladium of your liberty and mine. Thank God, one voice is still left up in New England that has the courage to lift itself in protest against this outrage, that of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY]. His position and his speech against this bill have the ring of the statesmen of old, those great men who have helped to make the Republic great and illustrious. There is one other Member, hailing from the great West, who rises up from the broad prairies of his State like a mighty Pelion of power from among the warts of weakness and demonstrates his great ability as a statesman and his great courage as a man, and this is the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS]. If this House were filled up with men like these our Republic would endure and our Constitution would be our shield and buckler, protecting our liberties and freedom for all time.

I will not, Mr. Chairman, go into every phase of this great question, because that has been done fully and completely by others, and they have with more ability than I possess demonstrated the unconstitutionality of this bill. I can not better state the case than to quote from the able speech of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY]. He said:

The longer this bill is studied, the more the lawyers in this Congress investigate the decisions of the courts the less support the bill will have; however, in my opinion no lawyer in the House that approaches this bill with an unprejudiced mind and has not previously committed himself to colored constituents and is free from fear or coercion in the performance of his duty, can arrive at any other conclusion but that this bill stands without any support whatever in the Constitution or laws of the land, and that it attacks the very foundation of a republican and constitutional form of government like ours, and further, that its enactment would be the entering wedge to the destruction of the rights of the common people in every State of the Union.

Yea, verily, Mr. Chairman, it does mean the destruction of the great Constitution and the Republic of our fathers, which means the destruction of the rights of the common people. Why, sirs, if the Supreme Court should hold this bill constitutional, then, indeed, will all power be held to be within Congress, and Congress alone will determine the scope of its own power. There will, in fact, be but one government, and that will be a monster here in Washington, where all State rights and all State laws are to be abolished and the people are to be ruled by Federal agents, Federal marshals, Federal judges, edicts of Presidents and Federal troops, and every vestige of State government destroyed.

If Congress can say that when five or any number of men commit a crime and the State fails to prosecute them Congress can take jurisdiction and pass a law to try and punish them, why not four or three or two or one? And if for killing a Negro, then why not for killing a white man? If for murder, then why not for any other crime? Such is their logic. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who, as Mr. HERSEY says—has a large organization of colored voters that pay no attention to the rights of Congress to enact this legislation, whether right or wrong, legal or illegal—and so forth, admits that the Supreme Court has up to date held all legislation like this unconstitutional, because he is familiar with the decisions, yet he supports the bill. To justify such a course, he contends that the Constitution is a living thing and is growing. Such a contention is, of course, absurd, but it shows to what length Republicans will go to support this bill. They claim that they promised this legislation during the campaign, and I suppose they did, to hold the Negro vote. They are now paying that political debt, though it costs them the Constitution and causes them to violate their oaths of office. What is this to a Republican when in a campaign and what does the oath of office amount to when in office? So, constitutional or unconstitutional, oath or no oath, they are going to pass this bill through this House. Many of them know that the bill is not constitutional. But, in my judgment, it will avail them nothing.

It, of course, is unthinkable to even imagine that the Supreme Court will hold this bill to be constitutional. Yet if such legislation is held to be constitutional by the Supreme Court, then our Federal system has been destroyed by Congress, and the Constitution, which Congress has sworn to uphold, will be destroyed by the very men sworn not to destroy but to uphold it. Some Congressmen try to avoid all responsibility of passing upon the constitutionality of a bill by saying, "Oh, well, if it is unconstitutional the Supreme Court will so hold," and deliberately vote for measures that they know to be unconstitutional. Such men are common liars and perjurers. The fathers adopted a most solemn oath to prevent this very thing being done. Here is the oath that every Congressman and Senator must take:

I, A. B., do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion, and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter. So help me God.

Under this very solemn oath every Congressman is just as much bound to uphold the Constitution as any member of the Supreme Court. So, without any Supreme Court decision, each of you that vote for this bill violates that solemn oath, even though you try to avoid it by passing the responsibility to the court. But what can you hide behind when the Supreme Court has repeatedly held such legislation unconstitutional? This debate has clearly shown that the Supreme Court has at no time even intimated that such legislation would be tolerated. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the only clause under which anyone contends that this bill is constitutional is the fourteenth amendment. This, to my mind, is not only untenable but absurd. This amendment is directed against the State and not individuals. The amendment was intended only and solely for the purpose of requiring the State, as a State, to give the Negro the same rights that it did the white man; the same right to hold property, the same legal protection of life, the same right to trial by jury, the same right to be confronted by his witnesses, and so forth. In other words, the amendment was directed against the State legislatures for the purpose of preventing them depriving a Negro of equal protection of the law with the white man by making one law for the white and one for the Negro. When the State laws do give the same rights to each, then the fourteenth amendment has been complied with. If you will read the debates in Congress at the time the amendment was agreed to and submitted to the States for ratification, you will be convinced that those who supported and passed the bill thought they had so drawn it as to prevent Congress assuming jurisdiction of the individual within the State. They thought that they had so drawn the amendment as not to permit Congress to destroy the States. This is conceded by every lawyer in the House. But it is argued by some Members not lawyers that, as the State can not act except through individuals, when the State or any subdivision thereof elects one of its citizens to an office, then if that citizen acts contrary to the fourteenth amendment, Congress can reach such officer and punish him. I deny that this is sound, because if he acts in accordance with the laws of the State he is protected and can by so doing be guilty of no crime. If the law under which he acts is in conflict with any provision of the Federal Constitution, that law can be declared unconstitutional. The party injured could have the right to go into court and raise the question of the State's right to enact and enforce such a law under the Federal Constitution. Now, for example, suppose a mob should take a Negro from the sheriff or jailer in whose legal custody he was, this bill seeks to take jurisdiction of the case and to have the mob indicted in the Federal court because such Negro did not have equal protection of law. If the sheriff connives or consents to turn him over to the mob, then the bill seeks to reach the sheriff and make him guilty of murder.

Now let us look at the first question, that of dealing with the mob. If the State law makes each member of the mob guilty of murder, whether the person is black or white, then there has been no discrimination on the part of the State. He has had the same protection of the law. The people of the State have, through their political agents in the legislature, given equal protection of law. The law deals with white mobs just as it does with Negro mobs. The law of the State gives the Negro mobbed the same protection of law that it gives a white man. It makes every man in the mob guilty of murder—makes him a criminal. Oh, you say he is not punished. But that still is not the State's fault. It is the fault of individuals. If they fail to do their duty, then they, too, become breakers of the State law. A failure to seek out and punish the mob will not give jurisdiction. If it did, then a failure to punish for any crime would give the Federal Government jurisdiction.

Now take the second proposition, when the sheriff does not protect his prisoner who is a Negro and without resistance permits him to be taken and mobbed. Here the sheriff has violated the law of the State and is a criminal under the State law. The State has done all that it can do to protect the Negro. The State has given the same protection to both white and black under its law, for there is no black statute and no white statute. It does not mention white or black, but the sheriff is guilty of the same crime whether the prisoner is white or black.

Neither the State nor Federal Government can be bound by the laches or crimes of its officers. Chief Justice Waite said in Hart v. United States (U. S. Repts., 95, 318):

The Government is not responsible for the laches or the wrongful acts of its officers.

Also see Gibbons v. United States (18 Wall, 269), United States v. Kirkpatrick (9 Wheat., 720), United States v. Vanzandt (11 id., 184), United States v. Nichol (12 id., 505), Jones et al. v. United States (18 Wall, 662). This has been and always will be the law. Judge Story says in his work on Agency, section 319:

The Government does not undertake to guarantee to any person the fidelity of any of the officers; that would involve it in all its operations in endless embarrassment and difficulties and losses which would be subversive of the public interest.

This language of Judge Story is now the law, for Mr. Justice Miller, in Gibbons against United States, quotes it with approval and as a part of the court's decision, and, further, in the same decision the court says:

The general principle which we have already stated as applicable to all governments forbids, as a policy imposed by necessity, that they should hold themselves liable for the unauthorized wrongs inflicted by their officers on the citizens, though occurring while engaged in the discharge of official duties. If an officer or agent of the State in violation of law commits an act to the injury of the citizen, it is an act beyond the scope of his agency, unauthorized by his principal, and the State is not liable therefor to the party injured.

Chief Justice White (91 U. S. Repts., 398) says:

Laches is not imputable to the Government in its character as sovereign by those subject to its dominion.

I could multiply decision on top of decisions, but this is sufficient to convince anyone not a lawyer of this well-fixed and certain rule of law. Every lawyer already knows this except the political lawyer here on this floor.

Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the House to the opinion of Branon of the fourteenth amendment in his work on the Constitution, page 108. He says:

It is hardly necessary to say again that the amendment does not touch the case of the individual or mob murder, as it deals not with acts of individuals but only with action by the State through its authorities. Such murders by individuals or mobs are to be dealt with only by the States.

My colleague from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] in his magnificent speech on this subject in his colloquy with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas correctly stated the law that has and will govern the court in all cases arising under the fourteenth amendment. The colloquy is as follows:

Mr. COLLINS. In the case of United States against Thompson et al., decided January 3, 1922, the court held that the United States Government was not liable for the torts of an agent. By the same reasoning neither can the acts of a lawbreaker be regarded as the acts of a State. The State defines certain acts to be crimes. It condemns them. These acts are not the acts of sovereignty.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Suppose he merely neglects to take the precaution that is necessary to protect the prisoner in his custody, then what does the gentleman have to say with respect to liability?

Mr. COLLINS. I was going to get to that in a little while, but I do not mind answering it now. There is no denial of equal protection of the law, because he has given to the man in his custody the same protection that every other prisoner has had. Everyone has the same protection, and all the Constitution guarantees is the same sort of protection for every man in his custody.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Suppose it is shown that the man charged with murder or rape happens to be a white man who six months before had been arrested by him was in his custody, and while there were a good many threats made, yet his attitude was such that no assault was made on the prisoner in his charge.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman assumes he did nothing but his duty. Of course, he has violated no statute.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But in the one case he did his duty and in the other he failed to protect the prisoner in his charge.

Mr. COLLINS. If he did his duty, the State has not denied the equal protection of the law. If he failed to do his duty, he can be punished by State authorities.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. If I have not succeeded in making myself clear, my question is this: In the one instance, his action resulted in protecting the prisoner in his charge, and in the other instance, his action failed to protect the prisoner or his inaction failed to protect the prisoner.

Mr. COLLINS. Of course, we all know that States, through public officers, can not keep people from committing acts of violence. All in the world that the last clause of the first section of the fourteenth amendment does is to prevent a State from denying to any person the equal protection of its laws. In other words, it condemns State action that does this and not individual action, and the law is that when an officer does something in violation of a State law, then his action is that of an individual and not that of an officer. If the gentleman from Kansas went downtown and got drunk, he would not be acting as a Congressman of the United States, but as an individual, as a citizen. Anybody who is a lawyer and familiar with the decisions knows this.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Constitution guarantees the equal protection of the law.

Mr. COLLINS. It does not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It guarantees that no State shall deny equal protection of the law.

Mr. COLLINS. That is right; that is the way it is.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In the question I put, in the one instance the officer gave the protection of the law to the prisoner in his charge, and in the other case he failed to give that protection.

Mr. COLLINS. The State did not violate any provision of the Constitution in either instance. The same officer gave to every prisoner within his jurisdiction the same protection, the identical protection, and equal protection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. In one case he protected the prisoner from the mob.

Mr. COLLINS. In the one case murder was committed and in the other murder was not committed, but the State did not commit the murder. Some lawbreaker did it, and lawbreakers are not agents for the State. States operate through legislatures, through the courts and other public officers, and only through them. States do not operate through reckless or lawless individuals, and when an officer violates the law he is not acting for the State, but as an individual. If the gentleman will read the cases he will see that that is correct.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have evidently failed to make my point clear to the gentleman.

Mr. COLLINS. No; the gentleman has not. I understand it thoroughly.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then, the gentleman has not answered my question. The officer in both cases represents the State.

Mr. COLLINS. Not when he does an unlawful act.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. He is in charge of the prisoner in both cases.

Mr. COLLINS. Sure, and the State law requires him to protect the prisoner.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. But in the one instance he protects the prisoner and in the other he does not.

Mr. COLLINS. Then he has violated the State law and the State can punish him, but the Federal Government can not, because it is a State matter.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The fourteenth amendment guarantees equal protection of the law.

Mr. COLLINS. To whom?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. To all people.

Mr. COLLINS. No; it does not. The gentleman ought to be ashamed to say that. The fourteenth amendment addresses itself to State action and not to individual action.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I think after the semicolon it addresses itself to the sheriff.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman can not cite a single case to uphold him in that. If the gentleman will get Rose's Notes, he will see that after the word "nor" "any State" is added. If the gentleman will examine any of the cases, he will be driven from such a conclusion. Even a reading of the amendment will show him this. It is pure ignorance for the gentleman to talk otherwise.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. At least I am not prejudiced in the matter.

Mr. COLLINS. And neither am I. If I thought the bill would do a single particle of good, I would vote for it; but I know better than that.

Aside from all this, there has been no denial to any person the equal protection of the laws provided for in the fourteenth amendment, because the States have not, in fact, accorded prisoners that have been lynched other and different protection than that accorded other prisoners. All that is required by the Constitution is the same kind of protection, or equal protection, and this has been given.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Could a State be liable for inaction?

Mr. COLLINS. Of course not.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It could not be held liable, then, under the fourteenth amendment, taking both clauses——

Mr. COLLINS. Oh, there are five of them.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I mean both clauses that refer to equal protection of law.

Mr. COLLINS. The first and last sections are the ones which the gentleman is interested in.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The only ground upon which it could become liable would be upon some affirmative action upon the part of the State. Is that the contention of the gentleman?

Mr. COLLINS. Of course, if a State did not violate a provision of the amendment, there can be no ground for Federal action.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And that a failure to act in any particular would not make them liable?

Mr. COLLINS. Of course not.

Mr. Chairman, in this colloquy Mr. CAMPBELL is driven to admit that Gen. COLLINS had correctly stated the law. This speech of the gentleman from Mississippi is one of the best, if not the best, legal argument made on this question during this entire debate, and I commend it to all Members of Congress, especially those who did not hear it. In my opinion, his argument is unanswerable.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is the most remarkable bill in the history of all civilized legislative bodies of the earth. It is the only bill ever introduced in any legislative body on earth which in its terms and by its provisions proposes to offer protection to a person guilty of murder, rape, arson, or other crime, or a person charged with being guilty of a crime, but offers no protection to a person absolutely innocent of any crime or not even charged with a crime. For example, if a mob takes a Negro murderer or rapist from a sheriff or out of a jail and mobs him, then the mob can be punished in the Federal court, but if the mob should go to an innocent Negro's house, guilty of no crime and charged with no crime, and take him out and hang him, the mob does not violate any law proposed in this bill or any law of the Federal Government. So this bill should be called "A bill for the protection of murderers, rapists, and all other criminals." This, though, is in keeping with the proponents' views of what law should be. They would protect from the mob the black brute covered with the innocent blood of some sweet white girl that he had just ravished, but offer no protection for the innocent Negro not charged with a crime. How do you think the good Negroes of the South as well as the North will relish such damnable legislation?

This problem has heretofore been looked upon as the problem of the South, and here fifty-odd years after the Civil War, when you have the power, you have not presented to us any measure to help us solve the problem, but are making it harder for us. The man who says lynching will be stopped by virtue of this law does not know the instincts of the Anglo-Saxon blood. Do you know when the crime of lynching is going to stop in my country? It is going to stop when the beast shall cease to outrage white girls in the South, and thank God it will never stop until then. [Applause.] Now look at me if you will, in surprise; do not be misled about it. Somebody made the statement that 32 per cent of the lynching had been caused by crimes other than rape. That is not true in the South.

When you had the race riot in Chicago Negroes were killed by the hundreds; that was not a question of rape. When you have a race riot, as you had in Springfield, Ill., where they killed some forty-odd and hanged quite a number of Negroes in the sight of the statue of Abraham Lincoln, that was not rape; that was murder. On one occasion a Republican Representative from Springfield, Ohio, was on the floor making a speech against the South for lynching, and that night after he had made his speech against the South a race riot occurred in his town, and in the House of Representatives the next day each Congressman had opened in front of him, Republicans as well as Democrats, the morning newspapers with big headlines proclaiming the horrible race riots in Springfield the night before, where scores of Negroes were killed and blocks of property burned and hundreds of Negroes homeless by virtue of the white people's rage, and when that Representative walked in there was tremendous applause. He saw the newspapers and knew what caused the applause, and became very angry and walked out. He never mentioned, from that day, during his entire service the South nor the southern people's treatment of the Negro.

This problem hangs over the heads of the white people of the South like that black cloud now in the galleries; this problem we of the South have to solve, and in God's name we know we have done the best we could. Yet we even get no sympathy, much less help, from you Republicans. You have always done what you are now doing—played politics with the Negro. You know that this bill will do the Negro no good. It will do harm. If you think so much of him, why not invite him to come into your own States, offer him work as we do in the South, offer him bread and not a political stone? In my own State I know that we have done the best that we could. The good Negro is prosperous and always has a good home and enjoys the equal protection of law. He is happy and will remain so if you will let him alone and quit meddling with a question you do not understand. We know that you are playing politics. We know that without the Negro vote you would not be in power to-day. So you now inveigh against us for lynching the Negro, not because you would not do the same thing if situated as we are to-day, but you are doing this to keep his vote. Not in more than 30 years has there been such a holocaust of murder as obtained here in Washington three years ago, and in Chicago shortly after that. Negroes were run out of Chicago by the thousands. Yet in my own State there have been fewer and fewer lynchings each year, because the causes have been less and less. It has been due to the fact that there have been less and less beastly crimes of rape committed in my State.

There was some years ago a little blue-eyed girl of 14 years of age, the daughter of splendid parents. Her father was a minister of the Gospel. She was the favorite child of the little village, and everybody knew her and felt an interest in her. She was always bright and beautiful as a morning-glory. She knew nothing but kindness at her own home and among the neighbors.

One quiet Sunday afternoon, as she was going to a neighbor's to visit a girl friend of hers, she was seized by a black brute. His hand over her mouth, her little body was carried out to the woods and the beast ravaged her. The mangled, bleeding form of the little child was brought back to the arms of her mother and father. Everybody that had known the little child loved her. The neighborhood soon learned that she had been outraged, ruined, and her body mangled. I do not know what you are, gentlemen. You are Republicans in politics, but, God knows, I believe you are men and I believe you are white men. There is not one of you worthy of the name of Anglo-Saxon who would not have been willing to join in the mob to vindicate the death of the little girl. It is horrible to think of taking a little child into a court room and making her describe, as one must in a court room, the horrible details of the crime of rape. Look at me, if you love your wife and children. Yet I have heard people here talking about the savagery of mob law. No one believes in mob law. I deplore it as much as anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, Theodore Roosevelt, in one of his books—I think it is Winning of the West—has a picture of a man hanging to a tree, and underneath the picture and in the text you learn that it is the picture of a horse thief. In that particular chapter Mr. Roosevelt indorses the hanging, because horse stealing was broken up by this method by the vigilantes. Now, he did not justify lynching, except that, as bad as it was, it was the very best remedy for breaking up horse stealing.

No good man in the South believes in lynching as a method of enforcing law. But as long as rape continues, lynching will continue. For this crime, and this crime alone, the South has not hesitated to administer swift and certain punishment. We have about broken up lynching in the South, and we are going to break it up, so help us God. We are going to protect our girls and womenfolk from these black brutes. When these black fiends keep their hands off the throats of the women of the South then lynching will stop, and it is never going to stop until that crime stops. [Applause.] This is the truth, and you know that I am telling the truth. There is not one of you Republicans who is worthy of the name of man but would do the same thing. This is no sectional question. Put the Negroes in New England and you would do the same thing. You do it now when you have the provocation. You do not cease to be real men except in politics.

Every race of the human family has grown great just in proportion as it protects its women. When they cease to do that, they are not worthy to rule, and by divine decree and by the inevitable law of "the survival of the fittest" they will cease to rule, and ought to cease. I ask only the brave, strong, virile, and virtuous men of the North to join with the good and strong men of the South and kill this infamous bill. Leave this question to the States, where it is being so rapidly and so surely solved.

Now, gentlemen, in a short time you will make your record. It is a solemn hour for my people in the South, but it is also a solemn hour for you and your country. Will you deliver this final blow to local self-government? Will you place every governor of every sovereign State under bond to the Federal Government? Will you place every sheriff, every marshal, every judge of every State in the Union under bond to the Federal Government? Will you drive this knife to its hilt into the already bleeding Constitution of our fathers? Will you destroy this Federal Government which you claim you saved and preserved? When this Constitution is destroyed the Government of our fathers is destroyed and you have substituted something else for it. You shall not do it with my vote, and even if you do pass this law I say that your law will fail. You shall not successfully promote, encourage, foster, and protect the rapist by this law. The white men of the South are ready for the sacrifice of life itself, if need be, to protect their fair women. Our wives, sisters, and daughters shall be protected from the lust and passion of these black brutes. Before God and high heaven this is the sacred truth. I would rather the whole black race of this world were lynched than for one of the fair daughters of the South to be ravished and torn by one of these black brutes. Now, if this be treason, make the most of it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, if I had a minute I would like to answer that.

Mr. SISSON. I wish I had unlimited time to debate the matter with the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It is the first time that I have heard mob law openly advocated in the Congress of the United States. [Applause on the floor and in the gallery.]

Mr. SISSON. I never advocated mob law. Does the gentleman advocate rape?

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gallery is out of order.

Mr. SISSON. I want to know if the gentleman advocates rape.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, that is simply silly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will be seated.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman is just as idiotic as any man I know.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman has openly advocated mob law right here in the Congress of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will be seated.

Mr. SISSON. Of course, the gentleman takes advantage of the House to protect him. He would not say those things when he is not on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi will be seated. All gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Oh, that is pretty cheap.

Mr. SISSON. Of course, you are always cheap.

The CHAIRMAN. All gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. SISSON. Let the Chairman get that black crowd in the galleries in order, and the gentleman from Wisconsin who began this out of order, and I will be in order and not until then.

The CHAIRMAN. All gentlemen will be seated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can not raise a question of personal privilege in the committee. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KNIGHT].

Mr. KNIGHT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in view of the fate of the thirteenth, the fourteenth, and the fifteenth constitutional amendments in the South it seems to me that my Democratic friends should not now exhibit such great tenderness as to whether this bill is constitutional or not. Nor does it seem to me that the honorable gentleman [Mr. LINTHICUM] who is afraid that it is going to create a supergovernment need concern himself greatly about that in view of the record of his party, which is somewhat in favor of super-government, if we may judge it by the past.

I am not a practicing lawyer, but I have grave doubts as to whether the bill before us is constitutional in the meaning of the Constitution as conceived by its founders. I think it would have shocked even Alexander Hamilton had anyone asserted that by act of Congress the Federal powers might be extended to the regulation of affairs and the punishment of persons wholly subject to the police powers of the States. But why cavil about this matter now? The question of the gentleman who wanted to know, "What is the Constitution among friends?" is in order before any session of Congress.

Only the other day the Attorney General of the United States asserted that personal liberty was not dead in this country, but that it had become just academic. A little later a grave and reverend Senator laid down in the course of debate what once would have been a startling proposition, that in a Republic the minority has no rights inconsistent with the will of the majority.

In view of such pronouncements, in view of the fact that Congress has for a number of years overridden practically every constitutional limitation that once guaranteed sovereignty to the States, and the courts have upheld such laws, what is the use now of raising any question of this kind?

Truly we might paraphrase the learned Attorney General and say that while the Constitution is not dead it has become academic; in fact, so much so that under its elastic principles we can prohibit the transportation of painted butter or lottery tickets, but we must not dare even to think of prohibiting taking the products of child labor from one State to another. Indeed, if there are any exclusive rights left to the States it is difficult to recall them.

The centralizing process, begun when the stars and bars went down at Appomattox, is just about finished and over us triumphantly arises not the Federated Union of the fathers, but a great imperial Republic which has obliterated State lines, and as the rod of Moses swallowed up all competitors so has it enmawed all of the preservative powers once vouchsafed to the States. Its long arm reaches across State boundaries and snatches the foaming glass of beer from the hands of the poor hell-bent miscreant who foolishly imagined that governments were not instituted to prescribe what man shall eat or drink. Its latest stunt is to take into its all-powerful arms expectant mothers, who, under the tender guidance of the dear old maids of the Children's Bureau, are to be taught how to bear and rear perfect babies. A little later we shall no doubt have a paternity bill also, and under it God only knows what they will attempt to do to mere man.

In view of all this, and infinitely more that I might relate if I loved the noble pastime of congressional speaking, I again ask, Why cavil over the constitutionality of this bill?

It was conceived in a spirit of entire fairness. There is not a line in it that raises any sectional or race question. I see nothing in it that should provoke the resentment of any of our friends on the other side of the House. I would be the last one to raise or advocate any such issue. I am sure there is no man on that side of the House who will dispute the statement that lynching to-day is the blackest crime that stains the fair name of our great Nation. It not only humiliates us abroad but it threatens the very stability of government at home, and its prevalence is confined to no section of the country. If Negroes have been lynched in Georgia and Texas, so have they been in Illinois and Ohio, and in Illinois and Ohio the foul crime should be as swiftly and certainly punished as in Georgia or Texas. Experience has shown, however, that it is alike difficult, North or South, to punish such criminals in local courts. It may not always be easy to do so in the Federal courts, but I think I am entirely within the limits of the truth when I assert that it will be easier to do so in the Federal courts. That fact justifies this provision of the bill.

Any Member of Congress who would assert that we are not altogether a highly civilized and religious Nation would immediately draw down upon his devoted head the impassioned eloquence of my good friend who so ably represents the Atlanta district [Mr. UPSHAW]. I would not be surprised if it did not also bring to bat my good friend from the seventh Ohio district [Mr. FESS], in which is located the fair city of Urbana. Yet 1,900 years of Christianity have taught the mob of neither Atlanta nor Urbana much about that scriptural injunction, "Thou shalt not kill." Whether a good stiff fine laid upon those communities would have had a more deterrent effect, I can not positively assert. However, since that noble creature, fashioned after the image of the Creator, left the hunting pack and learned to walk on his hind legs down to the present time, when he adorns himself with a plug hat and long-tailed coat, has cared more for money that he ever has either for civilization or religion, I would rather bet on a fine than a camp meeting as a guaranty of good behavior.

As long as humanity may sin and repent it will take a chance on landing in Abraham's bosom across the Great Divide. But when it must pay for its sin here and now, in cold cash out of its own pocket, that fact will cast a damper upon the native hue of our resolutions and cause us to pause and consider whether it is not better to bear the cash we have than to fly to obligations we know not of. In other and plain words, this provision in the bill which fastens a fine upon that community that tolerates mobs will do more to prevent mob violence than all the preaching of Billy Sunday.

Briefly, gentlemen, for these reasons I am going to chloroform my doubts and stretch my convictions against Federal invasion of State rights, even as the Constitution has been stretched, and vote for this bill. Indeed, if the Constitution can be stretched to protect the profits of child labor and to safeguard the integrity of painted butter, surely we may risk a little more to minimize the greatest menace to society in this country and to safeguard the rights often of the innocent victim against the brutal and unreasoning passions of mob violence.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think it is generally conceded on both sides of the Chamber that the debate which has taken place on this measure, known as the antilynching bill, conferring jurisdiction on Federal courts in lynching cases, has conclusively shown that many of the provisions of the bill are beyond the power of Congress to enact. That the fourteenth amendment, or particularly that part of that amendment upon which this legislation is predicated, was never designed to give the Federal Government power to enact legislation operative on individuals as proposed is susceptible of almost mathematical demonstration. The only semblance of authority that can be produced or even plausibly urged is that offered to sustain that provision operative as against officers, and that, according to my mind, can not be successfully maintained, because to make it operative on officials of a State it can only be predicated upon the theory that in doing the acts which are inveighed against they are acting as the instruments of the State's will. The decisions which have been referred to in this discussion—the Home Telephone Co. case, from California, and the case of Ex parte Virginia, and to which I shall later refer—when analyzed will not give any foundation for the legislation, because in each of those instances every act which was complained of and given as an excuse for the exercise of Federal power was the exercise of some power granted by the States within which those cases arose. If Congress under the fourteenth amendment has the power to say that the State has denied equal protection of the laws with reference to life, it may do so with reference to violence in other forms, to property, personal or real, and any case of controversy between the citizens of a State can be made the excuse for the intervention of the Federal judicial power. There are no bounds when you embark on this policy. It means, followed to its logical conclusion, that the Federal Government can grasp every element of State jurisdiction and make the Federal will absolutely supreme throughout the whole body of human rights.

If individuals, State officials, and counties can be penalized, as is sought to be done by this bill, then, indeed, the effacement of the States can be accomplished.

In approaching the consideration of legislation, whatever its character, two questions are presented to the mind and conscience of Congress—has Congress the constitutional power to enact it, and does it express a sound and wise Government policy? However, when a measure departs so radically from the traditionally accepted theory of the limitations of Federal power as does the pending antilynching bill, an examination of the fundamental question of constitutional authority becomes imperative. It becomes imperative because, if beyond the power of Congress, the act is vain and futile and will be declared void by the courts. But above and beyond such a consideration it becomes imperative because each Member of Congress is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. He is not sworn to support the Government, he is not sworn to support the platform of any political party, but he is sworn to support the Constitution of the United States. That form of oath was prescribed because it was conceived by the founders of the Republic that the surest and safest guaranty of the liberties of the people lay in observance, by those intrusted with office, of the limitations upon their own power imposed by that instrument and in unyielding opposition to any usurpation of power by another branch of government. Executive and legislator, State and National, are restrained by its obligation. It was believed that if those in authority should respond faithfully to its commands and with obedience heed its limitations, tyranny could never successfully assail it, nor could the wild shouts of the commune ever shake it.

And yet frequently during the debate has been heard the declaration that Congress, whatever its doubts, should pass the bill and allow the Supreme Court to determine its validity. Such a course involves the avoidance of a solemn obligation. It seeks to shift it to other shoulders. Constitutional students have announced the true doctrine to be that Congress, if it entertain a doubt as to its power, should resolve that doubt against its possession. On the other hand, the courts in passing upon an act of Congress, unless it is made clearly to appear that Congress lacked constitutional authority, resolve the doubt in favor of its validity. Such a course is prompted by judicial respect for the acts of a coordinate branch of the Government. The court assumes that Congress does its duty. It acts on the hypothesis that Congress will not shirk its responsibility; that it believes it possesses the necessary constitutional power. It presumes that Congress acts intelligently; that it inquires into its powers. It presumes that it thinks and acts with integrity; that it will not knowingly exceed its powers nor seek to exercise a doubtful one. Gentlemen who insist upon passing their own responsibility to the courts must realize that the courts will hesitate to overrule the expressed will of Congress; so realizing, they should with courage and conscience face the issue presented without passing it on to the courts. Whatever the power of Congress, its scope can only be determined by an examination of the Constitution and its judicial interpretation.

To measure what was in the mind of those who framed the Constitution, we must recall the situation with which they were circumstanced and note the governmental policies that guided them. We must remember that they were engaged in erecting a governmental system, unlike any then in existence. Their plan was modeled on no European prototype. It was no transplanted foreign product. They were seeking to set up and perpetuate a dual system of government the like of which had never been known.

The final plan was not the conception of a single political philosopher; it was not the realized dream of any single imagination; it was not the product of a Sir Thomas More, abstractly devised in completed form in a scholar's study. It was the product of many minds and many men, and more than that, it was the product of necessity—a necessity begotten by the situation in which the States found themselves when, through independence, they ceased to be colonies.

From the moment that independence was declared the Thirteen Colonies were 13 free and independent States. Each was sovereign—neither knew a superior power. The citizens of the respective States owed no allegiance save to their own Commonwealth. All natural rights to life, liberty, and property resided in the citizens of the several States, as citizens of a free Commonwealth, and for protection in their enjoyment they could look to no power other than that of their State. That condition continued except as modified for a time by the Articles of Confederation until the adoption of the Constitution of 1787.

A moment ago I said the Constitution was the product of necessity. That necessity lay in the fact that the statesmen of that time soon saw that, while each State was competent to administer its internal affairs, its police power, and its ordinary functions of government, such as protecting life and property and maintaining republican government, there existed matters of external and interstate concern which could best be provided for and regulated by some common Federal agency acting for the whole number of States. This was the thought that brought into being the convention at Philadelphia. Thirteen feeble and lately liberated States still feared foreign aggression; they must provide for the common defense, therefore an Army and Navy and the power to declare war. Their situation with regard to foreign nations was identical, therefore the treaty-making power and diplomatic relations. Each State was at liberty to prescribe its own customs and trade regulations and consequent controversies and obstructions to trade arose, therefore the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce was delegated to the Federal Government. For analogous reasons the control of the postal system, the coinage of money, the levy of taxes and creation of indebtedness for Federal purposes, and other powers, were vested in the Federal Government. The controlling purpose throughout the making of the Constitution was that only those powers which the States separately could not adequately exercise should be delegated to the Federal Union. They did not forget that in the beginning there were the States. They did not forget that before there was a Federal Union there were 13 free States. They did not forget that all and every power that resides to-day in the Federal Government, as well as all and every power that to-day resides in the State governments, before the Constitution, in their full and unrestrained sovereignty, resided in each of the 13 States.

In the Constitutional Convention there were those who contended for delegation of powers more sweeping than were granted, and others who complained at the extent of the authority actually conferred, yet there was no claim advanced that the States surrendered any power not expressly delegated or necessarily implied by the terms of the Constitution. Alexander Hamilton in the Federalist argued that all power not delegated by the States was reserved to them. While this view was everywhere generally accepted, to remove any semblance of basis for a contrary claim, the tenth amendment to the Constitution provided that the powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, were reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

Thus, from the esablishment of the Government under the Constitution it has been the view of statesmen of all parties that the Federal Government was one of enumerated powers and that warrant for the exercise by Congress of authority must be found either in the express or implied grants of the Constitution.

One of the distinguishing characteristics of the American system is its dual character. The Federal Government within the sphere of its activities is supreme. Within its proper field it can not be interfered with by any State or the agency of any State. On the other hand, the States within the just scope of their authority are supreme, and neither can their activities be limited or controlled by the Federal Government. Both the Federal and State Governments act independently of each other, and their laws bear directly upon the citizen, who owes a distinct allegiance to both. He is amenable alike to Federal and State regulations. He must render unto the State the things that are the State's and unto the Union the things that are the Union's.

The first 10 amendments were submitted by the First Congress, and for practical purposes may be regarded as parts of the original instrument. They are commonly termed the Federal Bill of Rights. However, it must not be inferred that the rights guaranteed by them refer to rights within the domain of State action. The amendments have been construed by the Supreme Court to constitute limitations on the power of the Federal Government. It will not be urged by those familiar with the scope of the original Constitution and such amendments that they afford any basis for the legislation now proposed.

FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT.

Proponents of the Dyer bill, however, base its alleged validity upon the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution.

As an outgrowth of the war between the States, the thirteenth amendment was declared to have been adopted December 18, 1865. While granting freedom to the slaves, its operation did not entirely satisfy the radical reconstruction element who then dominated Congress, and the fourteenth amendment was proposed by Congress on the 16th of June, 1866. After a stormy career in the legislatures of the States, the amendment was declared by resolution of Congress of July 21, 1868, to have been adopted. Its first section contains the following:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

To become acquainted with the motive of its proponents and what was sought to be accomplished, recourse may properly be had to the debate in Congress on the occasion of its submission.

Mr. Thaddeus Stevens, that bitter and relentless foe of the vanquished South, in reporting the resolution from the Committee on Reconstruction in the House of Representatives, in discussing the first section, containing the "equal-protection" clause, said:

> * * * the Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree.

It will readily be observed that Mr. Stevens had in mind that the Federal Bill of Rights contained only limitations upon the power of Congress and that the States in the plentitude of their reserved and sovereign rights were still free to retain laws which discriminated as between white men and black men; while the thirteenth amendment had conferred freedom on the blacks, it had not raised them to that equality before the law which it was the desire of Stevens and his followers to accomplish. During the discussion it was pointed out that the laws of some States prescribed punishments for Negroes different from that prescribed for white persons for the same offenses.

It was to destroy such laws and to prevent the enactment of similar ones that the amendment was devised. It was declared by those supporting the amendment that it had for its purpose the limitation of the action of the States; that its object was to prevent a State from enacting any law which might discriminate as between citizens of the United States, and to prevent a State from denying equal protection of the law to any citizen. We are not without an authority more distinguished than Thaddeus Stevens.

James G. Blaine was a Member of Congress when the amendment was proposed. In his Twenty Years in Congress he clearly expresses his view of the purpose and scope of the amendment. These are his words regarding the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments:

> Both of those amendments operate as inhibitions upon the power of the State and do not have reference to those irregular acts of the people which find no authorization in the public statutes. The defect in both amendments, in so far as their main object of securing rights to the colored man is involved, lies in the fact that they don't operate directly upon the people, and therefore Congress is not endowed with the pertinent and applicable power to give redress.

It will thus be seen that Mr. Stevens, though filled with fury toward the southern people, though anxious to promote domination of the Anglo-Saxons of the reconstructed States by the African black man, though stirred by the fiery rancor of the times to reckless and wanton exercise of power, never intended that the fourteenth amendment should extend to the lengths contended for to-day by gentlemen born since the War between the States, and in whose bosoms there should be no room for the play of the fierce passions of half a century ago. He never intended that the States should be deprived of their internal police powers. He intended the fourteenth amendment to be only a limitation on State action—action by the State as a State—action of the State, by the State, and for the State.

The simple language of the amendment within itself should be sufficient to clearly convey to the mind that conclusion. The language of its framers in confirmation of that construction should remove any doubt from the mind of the skeptic.

But we are not without the aid of construction by the highest court of the land. The fourteenth amendment was first exhaustively treated by the Supreme Court in the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall.). It will be remembered that in those cases, through a claim based upon the fourteenth amendment, it was sought to over turn an act of the State of Louisiana, and administrative acts thereunder, seeking to regulate slaughterhouses in and adjacent to the city of New Orleans. It was strongly urged that such acts discriminated against certain citizens theretofore engaged in such business and therein were violative of the amendment. The decision of the court, one of the really great decisions, in part reads as follows:

> Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment by the simple declaration that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the United States (I will add, "Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law") to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?
> All this and more must follow, if the proposition of the plaintiff be sound.
> For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance limiting and restricting the exercise of power by the States in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects, and still further, such construction would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve, as consistent with those rights as existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument, we admit, is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions, when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character, when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other and of both these Governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

In discussing the natural rights of life, liberty, and property, the court said:

> It would be the vainest show of learning to prove by citation of authority that up to the adoption of the recent amendments (thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth) no claim was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection beyond the very express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed on the States, such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex-post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions, the entire domain of privileges of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative powers of the State and without that of the Federal Government.

Following the war between the States, and as a part of the reconstruction program, Congress enacted the civil rights acts. These measures sought to prevent railway companies, hotels, theaters, and other enterprises serving the public from discriminating in any manner against any citizen on account of race or color; in other words, by imposing penalties they sought to require equal and identical accommodations and treatment at the hands of such institutions to both blacks and whites. Authority for the legislation, as in the present case, was claimed to rest in the fourteenth amendment. Suits were instituted against railways, theaters, and hotels for failure to supply to negroes accommodations of the same quality and in the same cars and buildings as those enjoyed by whites. Appeals in several cases were prosecuted to the United States Supreme Court, and that tribunal, in the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3), held that the section of the civil rights act at issue was unauthorized by the amendment. It was clearly and convincingly laid down that the prohibitions of the amendment were directed at State action and not individual action; that the denial of "equal protection of the law" meant denial by the State; that abridgment of privileges of citizens of the United States must be made by a State and not by its individual citizens before it could be brought within the denunciation of the Constitution. It was with like clarity pointed out that denial to negroes of accommodations equal to those furnished to whites by railways, theaters, and hotels was not denial thereof by the State, but was only denial by individuals.

Allow me to read a portion of the court's opinion:

> It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the law. * * * To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it.
> If this legislation is appropriate for enforcing the prohibitions of the amendment, it is difficult to see where it is to stop. Why may not Congress with equal show of authority enact a code of laws for the enforcement and vindication of all rights of life, liberty, and property? If it is supposable that the States may deprive persons of life, liberty, and property without due process of law, and the amendment itself does suppose this, why should not Congress proceed at once to prescribe due process of law for the protection of every one of these fundamental rights in every possible case, as well as to prescribe equal privileges in inns, public conveyances, and theaters?

In Barbier v. Connally (113 U. S., 27), Mr. Justice Field reiterates in vigorous fashion the same doctrine. He said:

> The fourteenth amendment, in declaring that no State "shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws," undoubtedly intended not only that there should be no arbitrary deprivation of life or liberty or arbitrary spoliation of property but that equal protection and security should be given to all under like circumstances in the enjoyment of their personal and civil rights; that all persons should be equally entitled to pursue their happiness and acquire and enjoy property; that they should have like access to the courts of the country for the protection of their persons and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts; that no impediment should be interposed to the pursuits of anyone except as applied to the same pursuits by others under like circumstances; that no greater burdens should be laid upon one than are laid upon others in the same calling and condition; and that in the administration of criminal justice no different or higher punishment should be imposed upon one than such as is prescribed to all for like offenses. But neither the amendment, broad and comprehensive as it is, nor any other amendment was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people.

A careful examination of these epoch-making opinions of the highest court must convince any unbiased searcher for the truth that the first section of the fourteenth amendment applies only to State action; that it does not add to the rights of individuals as against other individuals; that it does not authorize the Federal Government to invade the domain of rights for whose protection the citizen must look to the State and to prescribe the character or the degree of protection to be vouchsafed such rights; that so long as the State does not itself by some State action deny equal protection of the laws the Federal power can not be invoked, and in event of such denial by a State only that degree of Federal power sufficient to counteract and render ineffective such denial can be exercised. The only affirmative Federal right created by that part of the fourteenth amendment is the right to be exempt from discriminatory action by the State.

Such is the general scope and purpose of the amendment, but to demonstrate that it affords no basis for the pending measure it will be proper to address our attention to its various sections, because in its revolutionary provisions it seeks to occupy a wide territory.

The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has to-day indicated he will offer amendments to various sections, which will be adopted, and since the bill in its final form will contain them as amended we may discuss them as if already incorporated in the bill.

Sections 1 and 4 read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 and in lieu thereof insert the following:
"That the phrase 'mob or riotous assemblage,' when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.
"SEC. 4. The district court of the judicial district wherein a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall have jurisdiction to try and punish, in accordance with the laws of the State where the homicide is committed, those who participate therein, provided it is first made to appear to such court that the officers of the State charged with the duty of prosecuting such offense under the laws of the State fail, neglect, or refuse to apprehend or punish such participants, or that the jurors obtainable for service in the State court having jurisdiction of the offense are so strongly opposed to such punishment that there is no reasonable probability that those guilty of the offense can be punished in such State court. A failure for more than 30 days after the commission of such an offense to apprehend the persons guilty thereof shall be prima facie evidence of such failure, neglect, or refusal."

It will be seen that the real purpose of the two sections is to confer jurisdiction upon the Federal court to try all persons participating in a lynching in any State in all cases in which the State authorities shall have failed either to apprehend or to punish the perpetrators of the crime. The original sections defined a mob as consisting of five or more persons, and conferred jurisdiction on the Federal courts to try all participants in a mob, regardless of State action. The amendment limiting the jurisdiction of the Federal court to cases where the State has failed to apprehend or punish the guilty parties was evidently intended to meet the arguments denying authority in Congress to confer such jurisdiction on the Federal courts. The fundamental objection is that the equal-protection clause of the fourteenth amendment confers upon the General Government no power to punish individuals for infringement of the natural rights of other citizens, and confers on individuals no new rights as against the action of other individuals.

That the object of the provisions is to reach individual action is perfectly apparent. The taking of human life by any number of private individuals is homicide. It is no less murder when committed by 50 persons than when committed by 1 person. All who participate and share in the unlawful intent are equally guilty. Now, if Congress has the power to punish three perpetrators of a murder, it possesses the power to punish two persons who may commit the crime, and by the same token it may punish one person who may act alone. If Congress possesses the power to thus punish the infringement of the right to life, it also possesses a similar power to protect the property of individuals against invasion by other individuals. And so it might enact statutes punishing all manner of crimes against property, such as theft, burglary, arson, and other crimes of a kindred character, and, in short, prescribe a complete code defining and punishing the invasion of all human rights on the pretext of providing equal protection.

It will be observed that it is provided in section 4 that the Federal courts obtain jurisdiction if the State either fails to apprehend or fails to punish the guilty parties. Let us assume that the State apprehends the parties and tries them but the jury fails to convict. In such a case Federal jurisdiction attaches and the parties may be again put upon trial in the United States court. Necessarily that court will then possess the power to determine the guilt or innocence of the parties as well as the fact of punishment or nonpunishment by the State. Bear in mind that the parties can be tried in a Federal court for violation of a State law, notwithstanding the State itself has already acquitted them of guilt. It would be difficult to conceive a device better adapted for the destruction of the independence of the States and the integrity of their courts. The Federal power, with rod in hand, bends above the State and prescribes whom and how it shall punish for the infraction of its own laws; drags citizens acquitted in State tribunals to its own courts and tries them again for the same offense. To admit of such a proposition is to confess that the States as against the Federal Government are powerless to prevent the absorption by it of the entire police power, the regulation of its internal affairs, and the consequent destruction of the dual form of government which has characterized the American system. But no such authority resides in the Federal Government, nor has it ever resided there.

In 1870 the Congress in carrying out its plan of reconstruction enacted legislation known as the enforcement act. Section 6 of that measure, in part, reads as follows:

If two or more persons shall band or conspire together, * * * with intent to violate any of the provisions of this act * * * or intimidate any citizen with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States * * * shall be held guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court. * * *

A prosecution was instituted in the District Court of Louisiana against Cruikshank and others charged with engaging in a conspiracy to violate the above section. They were convicted, but upon review by the Supreme Court it was decided that the prosecution was not warranted by the fourteenth amendment. Chief Justice Waite rendered the opinion, in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., p. 555) and held that individual action in contravention of the rights of other individuals was not State action and could not be regulated by Congress. He said in part:

This provision does not any more than the one which precedes it, and which we have just considered, namely, the provision prohibiting a State from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism; every republican government is in duty bound to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. This duty was originally assumed by the States and still remains there. The only obligation resting on the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. The amendment —fourteenth—guarantees this, but not more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of the guaranty.

In a later case—United States v. Harris (106 U. S.)—the court adhered to the principles announced in the Cruikshank case. Congress enacted a statute known as section 5519, Revised Statutes, as follows:

If two or more persons in any State or Territory conspire and go in disguise upon the highways or on the premises of another for the purpose of depriving, either directly or indirectly, any person or class of persons of the equal protection of the law, of equal privileges and immunities under the laws, or for the purpose of preventing or hindering the constituted authorities of any State or Territory from giving to all persons within such State or Territory the equal protection of the laws, each of such persons shall be punished—

And so forth.

In the Circuit Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Tennessee, R. B. Harris and a number of others were prosecuted upon an indictment, one count of which charged:

That the defendants did conspire together for the purpose of depriving said P. M. Wells, who was then and there a citizen of the United States and of the State of Tennessee, of the equal protection of the laws, in this, to wit, said Wells having been charged with an offense against the law of said State was duly arrested by said Tucker, deputy sheriff, and so being under arrest was entitled to the due and equal protection of said laws and to have his person protected from violence while so under arrest, and the said defendants did then and there unlawfully conspire together for the purpose of depriving said Wells of his right to the equal protection of the laws and of his right to be protected in person from violence while so under arrest, and did then and there deprive of such rights and protection and of the due and equal protection of the laws of the State of Tennessee by then and there and while he, the said P. M. Wells, was so then and there under arrest as aforesaid, unlawfully beating, bruising, wounding, and killing him, the said P. M. Wells, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

The judges of the trial court were divided in opinion as to the constitutional authority of Congress, and the case was certified to the Supreme Court for decision. That court held that the prosecution could not be maintained, and in announcing its decision said:

If the fourteenth amendment is a guaranty against the acts of the State government itself, it is a guaranty against the exercise of arbitrary and unconstitutional power on the part of the government and legislation of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses; and the power of Congress, whether express or implied, to legislate for the enforcement of such a guaranty does not extend to the passage of laws for the suppressing of crime within the States. The enforcement of the guaranty does not require or authorize Congress to perform the duty that guaranty itself supposes it to be the duty of the State to perform.

* * * * * * *

A private person can not make constitutions nor laws, nor can he with authority construe them, nor can he administer or execute them; the only way, therefore, in which one private person can deprive another of the equal protection of the law is by the commission of some offense against the law which protects the rights of persons, as by theft, burglary, arson, libel, assault, or murder. If, therefore, we hold that section 5519 is warranted by the thirteenth amendment, we should by virtue of that amendment accord to Congress the power to punish every crime by which the right of any person to life, property, or reputation is invaded. Thus under the provisions of the Constitution which simply abolished slavery and involuntary servitude we should with few exceptions invest Congress with power over the whole catalogue of crimes. A construction of the amendment which leads to such a result is clearly unsound.

It will be noted that the Harris case is almost, if not quite, a blanket authority in point. The facts were that one Wells, charged with an offense against the law of Tennessee, while under arrest by an officer of that State was assaulted by a mob and killed. Upon such facts the prosecution was based. However, after a careful and thorough consideration of the whole question the court held that it was not within the province of the Federal Government to punish individuals for such a crime. The clear and cogent reasoning of the opinion is conclusive of the question raised.

The same principle was again announced in Jones v. Bowman (190 U. S.) in an admirable opinion by Justice Brewer. That learned jurist in construing the fourteenth amendment said:

The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism; every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

In Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313) Mr. Justice Strong held—

these provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.

It was again applied in the Hodges case, Two hundred and third United States. Certain laborers who were employed at a sawmill in Arkansas were set upon and beaten by other individuals and driven from their work. Prosecutions were instituted against the offenders on the theory that they had by their conduct conspired to deprive the injured parties of their rights to labor and pursue their callings. However, the Supreme Court, after exhaustive consideration, held that the right to labor, like other natural rights of life and property, depended for their protection upon the State governments and that the fourteenth amendment conferred no power on Congress to legislate for their regulation or to punish individuals for their infringement and that aggrieved parties must look to the State governments for protection.

The Federal Government either possesses the power to punish individuals in such cases, or it does not possess the power. The courts have uniformly held that it does not possess that power. And if it does not possess that power it can not exercise it. Even the failure of the State to exercise its power to punish does not devolve that power upon the United States.

We now come to section 2:

SEC. 2. That if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage, such State shall by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State, and to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured it is provided.

The object of this section is to preclude the courts from examining the question of whether or not any State has in fact denied "the equal protection of the laws." Whether a State has denied such protection is a fact ascertainable by the proper tribunal. But in order to form an artificial foundation upon which to erect this measure there is made a congressional declaration that if any State or governmental subdivision fails to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person against a mob such State thereby shall be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the law.

The report of the committee discloses that the representative of the Attorney General who appeared before the committee boldly announced that this declaration was to be made, so that if the courts should come to examine the question it might be said that Congress had already found as a fact that the occurrence of a lynching in a State was a denial of equal protection of the laws, and that in such a case the courts would respect such finding as final and binding. In other words, the real design of this section is to humbug the courts by a fictitious finding of fact before the occurrence of the fact, and by such fraudulent finding to bind the court and prevent a judicial examination of the question.

However diligent a State and its officers may be in its efforts to prevent a lynching, however vigorous its exertions, its mere failure to prevent a lynching is declared to be a denial of the equal protection of the laws. Though it does not in fact deny equal protection, the act declares that it does. Such a course is unworthy of the Congress. Such an apparent pretense should be rejected with scorn.

Astounding as are the provisions already discussed, there remains one that challenges the very existence of State authority, section 3, which seeks to punish State and municipal officers in Federal courts for failure to perform their duty under State law. Listen to the broad sweep of its language:

SEC. 3. That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty, or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being so put to death, or any State or municipal officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to perform his duty in apprehending or prosecuting to final judgment under the laws of such State all persons so participating, except such, if any, as are or have been held to answer for such participation in any district court of the United States, as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

Any State or municipal officer acting as such officer having under authority of State law in his custody or control a prisoner, who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person to put such prisoner to death without authority of law as a punishment for some alleged public offense, or who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person to suffer such prisoner to be taken or obtained from his custody or control for the purpose of being put to death without authority of law as a punishment for an alleged public offense, shall be guilty of a felony, and those who so conspire, combine, or confederate with such officer shall likewise be guilty of a felony. On conviction the parties participating therein shall be punished by imprisonment for life or not less than five years.

Here, especially, sight must not be lost of the dual character of the Federal system. Federal officers owe their duties to the Federal Government; State officers owe their duties to the State government. The laws which define their respective duties and prescribe penalties for their nonfulfillment derive their strength from the respective sovereignties. To allow the Federal Government to hold responsible a State officer for the performance or nonperformance of his duty to his State is to subordinate the State to the will or caprice of the Federal Government and to extinguish its independence, which is the glory of the dual system. Would anyone for a moment seriously contend that a Federal officer could properly be tried in a State court for failure to perform a duty as a Federal official? And yet such a suggestion would be no less logical than the plan now proposed. The duties of State officers are defined by State law alone. The sovereignty that commands the performance of a duty alone can punish its infraction. If the Federal Government can punish a State officer for dereliction of State duty, then the same power may prescribe and define those duties. We have already seen that this bill provides for the trial in Federal courts of individuals for violation of State law, though they may have already been acquitted in the State court. Now, if it be true that the Federal Government may punish "any State or municipal officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob" who fails, neglects, or refuses to "make all reasonable efforts" to perform his duty, it necessarily follows that the same power may define what "all reasonable efforts" means, may determine the measure of the duty, and, in fact, may prescribe that duty itself. Sheriffs, policemen, prosecuting attorneys, judges, and even governors are charged by State law with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting persons guilty of murder. If the Federal Government may invade a State court room, seize a citizen liberated by a jury after a legal trial, lay its hands upon the judge, the prosecuting attorney, and the sheriff—if it may even threaten the governor of a State—and drag them into a Federal court and punish them for what the Federal Government may deem dereliction of State duty, then, indeed, the independence of the States becomes a vain dream, State authority a mere phantom, and our dual system of government may be relegated to the realm of things that were.

But again the answer is that no such power was ever granted to the United States. It is no feudal lord to whose bounty or favor the States owe their existence. In the full stature of statehood they stand clothed with their own powers and privileges.

That the Federal Government can not control or direct State officers was decided as long ago as 1860. Kentucky v. Dennison (24 Howard), was a case involving an act relating to fugitives from one State to another and undertaking to define the duties of State officers in relation thereto.

Judge Taney in announcing the opinion said:

Looking to the subject matter of this law and the relations which the United States and the several States bear to each other, the court is of the opinion the words "it shall be the duty" were not used as mandatory and compulsory, but as declaratory of the moral duty, which this command created, when Congress had provided the mode of carrying it into execution. The act does not provide any means to compel the execution of this duty nor inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal on the part of the executive of the State; nor is there any clause or provision in the Constitution which arms the Government of the United States with this power. Indeed, such a power would place every State under the control and dominion of the General Government even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights. And we think it clear that the Federal Government, under the Constitution, has no power to impose on a State officer, as such, any duty whatever and compel him to perform it. It is true that Congress may authorize a particular State officer to perform a particular duty; but if he declines to do so it does not follow that he may be coerced or punished for his refusal.

It has long been settled by the courts that the United States can neither tax the salary of a State officer nor impose any burden upon an agency or instrumentality of a State government.

Collector v. Day (11 Wallace, 113), clearly announces the rule:

> As the States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution, so it has been held that the United States have no power under the Constitution to tax either the instrumentalities or the property of a State.

In Ambrosini v. United States (187 U. S., 1) it was held that Congress could not impose a stamp tax on a bond required by State law to be given as a prerequisite to the right to sell liquor. Justice White, in South Carolina v. United States (199 U. S., 465), said:

> It is not necessary to trace the want of authority of the United States to impose a license exacting on the agents of the State to an express provision of the Constitution, since the court has constantly held that the absence of authority in the Government of the United States to tax or burden the agencies or instrumentalities of a State government, and the like want of authority on the part of the States to tax the agencies or instrumentalities of the National Government, results from the dual system of government which the Constitution created, and that the continuance in force of such a prohibition is absolutely essential to the preservation of both governments.

But advocates of the bill when driven from section after section by decisions of the courts, clearly enunciating principles of constitutional law, make their last desperate stand on the decisions in Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S.) and Home Telephone Co. v. Los Angeles (227 U. S.), and doggedly contend that a State peace officer may be punished on the theory that his act is the act of the State, and that through him the State has denied equal protection of the law in lynching cases.

The Virginia case was a habeas corpus proceeding, in which Judge Coles, a county judge, had been indicted for violating a provision of an act of Congress, which made criminal the denial by an officer of a State to any citizen of a right guaranteed by the Constitution or laws of the United States. It was the duty of Coles, as county judge, to draw at the beginning of a year the jury panels for the year for the county and circuit courts of Virginia. The law of Virginia prescribing the qualifications of jurors did not discriminate in its terms against negroes. However, it was shown that Judge Coles, in selecting the lists of jurors, did discriminate against colored persons because of their color. While the case was pending in the Supreme Court the State of Virginia intervened in the proceeding and asked for the release of Judge Coles on the ground that he was one of her law officers and his services were necessary to the proper administration of justice in Virginia, and so forth. The court was divided, and Judges Field and Clifford dissented in a strong opinion. The majority remanded Coles, and in part said:

> A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision—fourteenth amendment—therefore must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade it.

It is upon this that gentlemen now hang their last hope. They argue that if Judge Coles as a State officer could be held to answer for discriminating against persons in the performance of a State duty, therefore the action or nonaction of a State peace officer in failing to prevent lynching can be construed to be the act of the State and to be a denial of the State through such officer of the equal protection of the law.

However, a careful analysis of the facts of this case and the decision of the court will reveal its lack of authority for such an argument. Judge Coles was in fact an officer of the State of Virginia, and it was through him only that the State of Virginia selected the lists of names of persons to serve as jurors for the circuit and other courts. The only authority which he possessed to select jurors at all was found in the law of the State. Everything which he did was done by virtue of that power. True, the law of Virginia in itself did not discriminate between blacks and whites as to jury service. However, the State of Virginia did intervene in the proceedings before the Supreme Court and avowed that the acts complained of on the part of Judge Coles were acts performed by him in behalf of the State of Virginia. The authority that commands an officer to select from the whole body of citizens names to serve as jurors implies the grant to such officer of a certain discretion or judgment and commands its exercise, because selections can be made in no other manner than that he is commanded to do. Now, if in the exercise of such judgment or discretion granted and commanded by the State the officer discriminated between the citizens arbitrarily on account of race, it can be seen upon what reasoning the majority of the Supreme Court held that the action of such officer was the act of the State of Virginia.

Every step which Judge Coles took was based upon his assertion of State power and his attempt to execute it. It was only through Coles that the State could select jurors. No other method was provided. When he selected jurors the State selected them. No other power but the State could select them or require their service. Discrimination was admitted. Equality of treatment was, in fact, denied. How can a State be said to deny equal protection of the laws to a person who may be lynched when its statutes make all murder, all lynching, upon whomsoever committed, criminal and equally punishable? Where is there any standard of comparison by which it can determine whether there has been denial of equal protection? If murder be committed by one or by five, is there any difference in the equality of protection?

However, in the case of a sheriff who has a prisoner in custody and who fails to prevent his death at the hands of a mob, or who surrenders him to a mob, it can not be said that his action is in any respect the act of the State. The statutes of every State command the sheriff to protect his prisoner. The statutes of every State condemn murder, whether by a sheriff, an individual, or many individuals. The sheriff in surrendering his prisoner or in conspiring with others to take his life is not only not acting for the State but is flying in the face of its solemn statutes and prohibitions. It can not be said that he has even the color of authority to act for the State in such a case. The act of an officer is the act of a State only when the officer expresses the will of the State—when he is executing or undertaking to execute the command of the State. It is absurd to charge an act committed in flagrant violation of statutes and decisions of the courts of the State to be the act of the State or an expression of its will. It has been uniformly held by the courts that a State is not liable for the torts of its officers, on the theory that when an officer exceeds or disregards his duties he ceases to act for the State. A sheriff is a sheriff only when he is performing the duties of a sheriff. His act is the act of the State only when he is acting in behalf of and as the agent for the State. For instance, if a sheriff, while not executing any writ or process, should meet on the highway a personal enemy and without justification should shoot him down, would gentlemen contend that the act of the officer was the act of the State, and, being the act of the State, could not be punished by the State?

In Home Telephone Co. v. Los Angeles (227 U. S.) the city of Los Angeles had been granted by the State of California the power to fix telephone rates within the city. It fixed the rates in a manner claimed by the telephone company to be confiscatory, and relief was sought in the Federal court.

The city of Los Angeles, on the other hand, contended that its act in fixing rates did not raise a Federal question, because the constitution of the State of California contained a clause prohibiting confiscatory rates; and since the rate fixed, if confiscatory, was in violation of the State constitution, it could not be construed to have been authorized by the State of California, and that a Federal question could not be presented until the courts of California should approve such rates and thereby make the fixation of the rates the act of the State.

The Supreme Court, speaking through Judge White, overruled this contention and held that since the city in fixing the rate acted under a grant of power from the State which involved the exercise of discretion or judgment, the act complained of was done by authority of the State, at least to the extent of authorizing Federal courts to assume jurisdiction to enjoin such rates as being confiscatory. It must be borne in mind, however, that this decision in no respect supports the proposition that under such a state of facts the Federal Government could itself have intervened and exercised the power to fix fair and just rates within the city of Los Angeles. It merely supports the view that the denial by the city of Los Angeles, acting under a State grant, of due process of law or the equal protection of the law to the telephone company was reviewable in the Federal court for determining the validity of the ordinance of the city. The Federal power was limited to the annulment of the city's act, and did not extend to the exercise of positive or affirmative action in prescribing a rate. The express grant by the State to the city of the power to fix rates necessarily included the implied grant to exercise a certain judgment or discretion in execution of the express grant. The mere power to fix a rate involved the power to fix it high or to fix it low. Without the grant by the State the city could not have fixed any rate.

The city, within the limits of governmental power granted to it by the State, was exercising the strength and the will of the State. It can be clearly seen with what reason the court held that the act of the city in fixing a confiscatory rate was the act of the State to an extent sufficient to authorize review. If the State of California had so desired, it could have declined to grant a charter to the city of Los Angeles, and could have directly governed the inhabitants of that city by its own statutes and regulations. In that event it could by law have fixed the telephone rates. In such a case it is clear that the fixing of a rate would have been the act of the State. Now, if the State prefers to delegate to the city council the power to fix a rate rather than to exercise it directly, the act is nevertheless the act of the State. Though performed by the city, when traced to its source it rests upon State authority.

By none of the arts of the advocate nor by any specious or skillful sophistry can authority to support this bill be found in Judge White's opinion. On the contrary, there is ample Federal judicial authority that the act of an officer, when contrary to the law of the State, can not be held to be the act of the State. In the Barney case (193 U. S.) the court held that where it was disclosed by plaintiff's pleadings that the act complained of was not authorized but was forbidden by the State legislation in question, there was no Federal question involved in the case on the theory of State action. An injunction was sought to restrain persons who were alleged to be acting under State authority from constructing a tunnel adjacent to the property of complainants. The plaintiff's pleadings, however, disclosed that the tunnel was being constructed contrary to the plans adopted by the municipal authorities. The court held that since the tunnel was not being constructed in the manner authorized by the State it could not be said that the State was denying due process of law or equal protection of the law. For that reason it was held that the controversy was one not involving a Federal question and should be dealt with by the courts of the State. The following is quoted from the opinion:

> Controversies over violations of the laws of New York are controversies to be dealt with by the courts of the State. Complainant's grievance was that the law of the State had been broken and not a grievance inflicted by action of the legislative or executive or judiciary departments of the State; and the principle is that it is for the State courts to remedy the acts of State officers done without the authority of or contrary to State law. (Missouri v. Dockery, 191 U. S., 165; Civil Rights cases, 109 U. S., 3; Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S., 313.)

Among other authorities which make clear that an officer of the State in exceeding his authority or in violating the laws of the State is not acting for the State is the case of Ex Parte Young (209 U. S., 123). Young, as attorney general of the State of Minnesota, had been fined for contempt. In habeas corpus proceedings he sought to justify his refusal to obey the order of the United States circuit court on the ground that he believed the decision of that court holding that it had the power to enjoin him as attorney general from performing discretionary official duties was in conflict with the eleventh amendment to the Constitution of the United States. He disclaimed any intent to show disrespect to the court, but based his refusal on the claim that he conceived it to be his duty as an official of the State to do the acts for which he was held in contempt. The court in its decision expresses itself as follows:

> The act to be enforced is alleged to be unconstitutional, and if it be so, the use of the name of the State to enforce an unconstitutional act to the injury of complainants is a proceeding without the authority of and one which does not affect the State in its sovereign or governmental capacity. It is simply an illegal act upon the part of a State official in attempting by the use of the name of the State to enforce a legislative enactment which is void because unconstitutional. If the act which the State attorney general seeks to enforce be a violation of the Federal Constitution, the officer in proceeding under such enactment comes in conflict with the superior authority of that Constitution, and he is, in that case, stripped of his official or representative character and is subjected in his person to the consequences of his individual conduct.

In the light of these decisions, if the act of a municipal officer, if the act of an attorney general, in excess of their lawful powers or in violation of the law is not the act of the State, how can the act of a sheriff or policeman in violation of State law be held to be the act of the State to the extent of authorizing the Federal Government to punish the offender? This contention of proponents involves an absurdity. In one breath they assert that the act of a sheriff or peace officer in surrendering a prisoner to a mob is the act of the State within the fourteenth amendment, and the next moment they seek to punish the same officer for failing to perform his duty to the State.

For the purpose of securing Federal jurisdiction the act of the sheriff is to be treated as the act of the State; for the purpose of punishing him it is to be treated as his own private act in direct violation of State law. Jurisdiction is to be secured on the assumption that the State acts through him and by him; once jurisdiction is acquired, he is punished for acting against the State and in violation of its will. If in truth his act is the act of the State, if in fact he expresses its will, cruel indeed would be the system that would permit the master to punish the servant. Such absurd examples serve to illustrate the difficulties that arise when gentlemen blindly enter upon a course that leads through error and fallacy. On the flimsy stuff that dreams are made of no firm foundation can be planted; who follows the lure of phantom fire loses his way amidst the tangled weeds and quagmires of the swamp.

But it is said that the fifth section of the amendment which authorizes Congress to enforce its provisions "by appropriate legislation" can be made to cover this act. By the term "appropriate legislation" is, of course, meant legislation reasonable and proper to make effective the terms of the amendment. Legislation can not extend beyond the amendment, because beyond its limits it fails for lack of support. The appropriate legislation must be nothing more than to effectuate the objects of the amendment. Appropriate legislation is that legislation necessary to nullify or render ineffective State action in denial of equal protection of the law. Congress has already enacted legislation of that character in providing that any citizen who sets up a denial by a State of equal protection or due process of law may have that action reviewed by Federal courts which possess power to vacate and annul such State action. If a statute is discriminatory it may be declared void and action based thereon vacated.

The bill seems to have been drawn with the idea that approach to the subject matter will be made from so many angles perhaps some feature may hang itself on some twig of constitutional authority. If it is determined that individuals can not be reached, if officers can not be punished, perhaps counties may be penalized, seems to have been the thought of its framers.

And so—

> SEC. 5. That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000, which sum may be recovered by an action therefor in the name of the United States against such county for the use of the family, if any, of the person so put to death; if he had no family, then to his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States. Such action should be brought and prosecuted by the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such county is situated in any court of the United States having jurisdiction therein. If such forfeiture is not paid upon recovery of a judgment therefor, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof by levy of execution upon any property of the county, or may compel the levy and collection of a tax therefor, or may otherwise compel payment thereof by mandamus or other appropriate process; and any officer of such county or other person who disobeys or fails to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment as for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor.

As has already been suggested, the power to tax the instrumentalities of a State has been many times denied by the courts. Pollock v. Trust Co. (157 U. S.) expresses tersely the well-established principle when it holds:

> The Constitution contemplates the independent exercise by the Nation and the State, severally, of their constitutional powers.
> As the States can not tax the powers, the operations, or the property of the United States, nor the means which they employ to carry their powers into execution, so it has been held that the United States has no power under the Constitution to tax either the instrumentalities or the property of the State.
> A municipal corporation is the representative of the State and one of the instrumentalities of the State government. It was long ago determined that the property and revenues of municipal corporations are not subjects of Federal taxation.

Again in United States v. Baltimore & Ohio Railway Co. (17 Wallace) it was held:

> A municipal corporation like the city of Baltimore is a representative not only of the State but is a portion of its governmental power. It is one of its creatures, made for a specific purpose, to exercise within a limited sphere the powers of the State. The State may withdraw these local powers of government at pleasure, and may, through its legislature or other appointed channels, govern the local territory as it governs the State at large. It may enlarge or contract its powers or destroy its existence. As a portion of the State in the exercise of a limited portion of the powers of the State its revenues, like those of the State, are not subject to taxation.

From amidst the wild and loose advocacy of this measure, from the murky fog of bombast and declamation that has filled this Chamber, it is refreshing to turn to that great interpreter of the Constitution, Judge Cooley—

> If the State can not tax the means by which the National Government performs its functions, neither, on the other hand and for the same reasons, can the latter tax the agencies of the State governments. "The same supreme power which established the departments of the General Government determined that the local governments should exist for their own purposes and made it impossible to protect the people in their common interest without them. Each of these several agencies is confined to its own sphere, and all are strictly subordinate to the Constitution which limits them and independent of other agencies, except as thereby made dependent. There is nothing in the Constitution (of the United States) which can be made to admit of any interference by Congress with the secure existence of any State authority within its lawful bounds; and any such interference by the indirect means of taxation is quite as much beyond the power of the National Legislature as if the interference were direct and extreme." It has therefore been held that the law of Congress requiring judicial process to be stamped could not constitutionally be applied to the State courts, since otherwise Congress might impose such restrictions upon the State courts as would put an end to their effective action and be equivalent, practically, to abolishing them altogether. And a similar ruling has been made in other analogous cases.

This sound and philosophical doctrine is founded upon the theory that "the power to tax is the power to destroy." If the United States can not burden or enfeeble a county by taxation, because to do so tends to destroy its life, how can it burden or enfeeble it by imposing a penalty? If it have the power to fix a small penalty it may assess a large one—one so large as to seriously threaten its life. If it may assess a penalty against one county it may assess one against every county within the State. To do that would be to penalize an entire State.

Section 5 arbitrarily levies a penalty of $10,000 upon a county in which a lynching takes place, even though the officers and people of the county may diligently endeavor to prevent the lynching.

Section 6 makes any county in which the victim may have been seized, though afterwards transported into another county, equally liable with the county in which he may be put to death. In this case it is of no consequence that the officers and citizens of such county may be wholly ignorant of the whole transaction and in no sense either criminally or negligently culpable.

Authors of the bill were, no doubt, prompted to insert the foregoing sections by similar provisions in the laws of several States. Such laws have been held valid in several States. They afford, however, no authority for what is here sought to be done. Counties are the creatures of the State. They are its agents and servants. They are organized as its instrumentalities through which to administer government. The State may abolish them altogether; it may destroy them if it will. Nothing stands in its way to penalize or punish a county save the laws and rules established by itself. The States, however, are not the creatures of the United States. It is rather the creature of the States. It can not lay the weight of its hand upon a county, except the State consent.

As though this measure were not already too ambitious, the chairman of the committee has offered an amendment proposing a new section, reading as follows:

SEC. 7. That any act committed in any State or Territory of the United States in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, which act constitutes a crime under the laws of such State or Territory, shall constitute a like crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, punishable in like manner as in the courts of said State or Territory, and within the period limited by the laws of such State or Territory, and may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States, and, upon conviction, the sentence executed in like manner as sentences upon convictions for crimes under the laws of the United States.

SEC. 8. In construing and applying this act the District of Columbia shall be deemed a county, as shall also each of the parishes of the State of Louisiana.

That if any section or provision of this act shall be held by any court to be invalid, the balance of the act shall not for that reason be held invalid.

It will be seen that under the above, offenses against aliens in violation of any right of such aliens as defined in a treaty between the United States and the country of their citizenship shall be triable in Federal courts.

As to the invalidity of all other parts of this legislation I have not the flimsiest doubt. Frankness, however, compels me to say that as to the above I am not so sure. The limits of the treaty-making power have never been definitely and clearly marked out by the Supreme Court.

The second paragraph of Article VI of the Constitution reads as follows:

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

My own view of the scope of the treaty-making power is that it is limited by all other provisions of the Constitution—in other words, that it can be exercised only within the compass of the powers granted to the Federal Government; that it can not invade the domain of the powers reserved to the States and interfere in the internal affairs of the State, because the State did not grant to the Federal Government the right to do so either by treaty or in any other manner.

It has been declared that the United States can not by treaty provide either that slavery may exist in a State or that a State shall have other than a republican form of government, or that the States shall have unequal representation in the Senate, or for the establishment by Congress of a State religion or the abridgement of free speech, or that a jury trial shall be denied in a Federal court. None of these things can be accomplished by treaty because the Constitution provides they shall not be done at all. As to them, the treaty power is limited by other provisions of the Constitution. On the other hand, there is a field within which the treaty power is clearly operative. Treaties of peace for the purchase or acquisition of territory or for the arbitration of international disputes are common and recognized as within the Federal power. But these matters clearly affect the external relations of the United States. An agreement undertaking to regulate commerce with a foreign nation would seem to be the proper subject of a treaty, and yet the Constitution grants to Congress the power to regulate foreign commerce and the treaty remains inoperative unless Congress assents to its terms. This is but another instance of the limitation of the treaty power by the Constitution. Now, it would seem to logically follow that the treaty power must be likewise limited by the tenth amendment to the Constitution, which declares that powers not delegated to the Federal Government nor prohibited by it to the States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people; that the police power, the internal government of the States, are beyond the reach of a treaty.

The Supreme Court of New Hampshire (13 N. H., 576) declared:

The police power of the several States, regarded as separate governments, is not a subject matter to which the treaty-making power extends.

The California Supreme Court (1 Calif., 232) as early as 1850 decided that a treaty is supreme only when made—in relation to those subjects the jurisdiction over which has been exclusively intrusted to Congress.

On the other hand, many entertain the contrary view that a treaty is the supreme law of the land and may override State constitutions and statutes almost, if not quite, at will.

Justice Field, of profound understanding of our constitutional system (133 U. S., 366), declared that the treaty power extends—

"To all proper subjects of negotiation" between the United States and foreign nations. After pointing out that a treaty can not do what the Constitution forbids, nor change the nature of the National Government, nor of the State government, nor cede any portion of the territory of a State without its consent, he added: "But with these exceptions it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions that can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country."

If a treaty may not do what the Constitution forbids, it would seem to logically follow that it could not invade the reserved rights of the States, because their exercise by the Federal Government is as much forbidden by the Constitution in the tenth amendment as though it were expressly named. The Federal Government is forbidden to exercise power not granted to it, and these were never so granted by the States.

However, it has been held by the Supreme Court that the inheritance by aliens of property within the States may be effected by a treaty, though not permitted by State law. (— Dallas, 199; 7th Cranch, 627; 100 U. S., 483; 133 U. S., 258.) The cases do not go further than that a treaty may enable aliens to inherit property in the same manner as citizens; they do not indicate that State laws of inheritance can be modified by the force of a treaty beyond the admission of aliens to equality of rights with citizens. It may be that Judge Tucker is correct in terming these holdings "an extreme view of the treaty power." However that may be, it can not with any degree of certainty be foreseen just how far the courts may declare the treaty power to extend.

It will be recalled that some years ago a controversy arose over the attempt of California to exclude Japanese children from the white schools. Japan protested against such action as being violative of her treaty rights. The subject of education is an internal concern of California, but if it be held that it is within the treaty power it is entirely probable that the laws of California will be made to bow to the terms of a treaty. The same fate would await Japanese alien land laws of several States.

An act committed in any State in violation of the rights of a citizen, which is a crime under the laws of such State, is triable in the courts of such State. If a treaty guarantees to the alien the same protection as is accorded a citizen, it would seem that trial of the offender in the same courts and under the same laws would fulfill the obligation. But by this bill, if an act be committed against an alien in violation of a right secured by treaty, the offender is triable in a Federal court. It can only with difficulty be conceived that our Government should bind itself to guarantee to aliens a higher degree of protection than it secures to its own citizens, and yet the underlying theory of this bill is that Federal courts afford greater assurance for the redress of wrongs than do State courts.

The scope of treaty power has not been sufficiently explored and delimited by the courts as to give assurance as to the validity or invalidity of section 7. But however that may be, serious question as to the wisdom and polity of its provisions can not escape our notice.

But, Mr. Chairman, whatever the power of Congress, is it the part of wisdom, on the plea of suppressing lynching, for the United States to embark upon a policy that can not fail to weaken State authority and render it less able in the future to withstand absorption of its functions by the Federal power? Lynching can not be defended, and I interpose no defense for it. Against it have been hurled the denunciations of every State in the Union. It is murder under the laws of every Commonwealth from Maine to Texas. Every State enjoins the protection by peace officers of prisoners in their custody. It has been disclosed by the debate that lynching is on a rapid decrease; that though the average annual number for the last 36 years has been 115, the number for 1921 was 63. Public sentiment against mob violence is growing in strength. Courts and officers are being encouraged in their efforts to suppress it. Prosecutions and convictions are increasing in frequency and will continue to increase when sustained by a wholesome public spirit, which is gathering force with the passing days. The remedy lies in strengthening State agencies rather than in weakening them; in reliance upon local authority rather than the distant and alien Federal power; in the sense of local and State responsibility to preserve law and order rather than in reliance upon external protection.

Was not the whole theory of local self-government erected upon such a foundation? Did not Mr. Jefferson, one of the world's greatest political philosophers, learned in the political systems of all time, advocate a political structure in which each precinct within a county should administer local concerns peculiar to the precinct; in which each county should discharge all governmental functions of which it was capable; in which the State should perform all general governmental duties, and that only those duties which could not properly or effectually be discharged by the State or its political units should be conferred on the Federal Government? Such a system quickens in the citizen an interest in his Government, it brings his country's affairs to his door, it inspires in him a desire to understand its workings, and encourages him to give something of himself to its service, to its strength, and to its permanence.

Is there not inherent in man an aspiration to have a part in making and enforcing the laws that govern him and protect him in his rights? Does there not reside somewhere in the inner chambers of the heart a spirit that resents the imposition of power by a distant sovereignty, however beneficent its motives? Has it not torn and distracted Ireland for more than a century? Can not its ominous rumblings now be heard as they roll out from the jungles of India? Is not Porto Rico, though making no complaint as to American misrule, now standing at the doors of Congress begging for a larger share of self-government? Does there not come up out of the Philippines, across 2,000 leagues of sea, the voice of that distant people asking for self-government? The power to enforce State laws now resides in the States and their agencies. Does not wisdom dictate that the control of their internal affairs be left where they now rest?

As has been so well pointed out during the debate, the people of the locality in which the mob spirit breaks out are the only persons who can prevent its violence. Will any added incentive be imparted to a State officer to apprehend a criminal, guilty of a heinous crime, when he may face Federal punishment in case his prisoner be taken from him and lynched? On the contrary, does it not hold up the constant temptation to escape possible punishment by the exercise of none too much zeal? Faithful and diligent officers prevent many lynchings by removal of prisoners to distant points. Shall their reward be possible punishment in case of failure? Federal intervention tends to create an attitude of "It is the business of the Federal Government. Let it attend to it."

The fury of a mob fanned to frenzy little recks of consequences. It acts quickly. United States marshals in few cases could reach the scene in time to prevent the consummation of its purpose. Local sentiment and local peace officers, with a sense of their own responsibility, acquainted with local conditions and anticipating the mob, can do more to prevent lynching than can a Federal post-mortem on the victim. There is no magic in Federal law. Through its mere fiat crime does not vanish. From the beginning the revenue laws have been violated. To-day the prohibition laws are widely and notoriously defied and others are daily broken. This affords no argument against their need, but it does supply evidence that Federal authority is not immune from challenge; that it possesses no sanctity that is inviolate.

But, even though it be noted with the deepest regret, the fact can not be ignored that considerations other than those of constitutional sanction and sound public policy have brought their influence to bear upon the action of this House. Oh for the day when the voice of sectional prejudice may no longer echo in this Chamber, when men's views shall be molded by principles rather than geography, when reason and logic shall wield greater power than latitude and longitude. Under the spell of their own oratorical enthusiasm some gentlemen have unmasked their real motives. In the eyes of a host of negroes in the galleries, many of whom were perhaps professional race agitators, they found favor by denouncing lynching as the product and institution of the South.

I shall not charge that a consuming passion to appear to the colored voter as his courageous champions added volume and vehemence to their impassioned eloquence; I do not charge that they were unmindful of matters of public policy and constitutional limitations, and yet, willingly or unwillingly, consciously or unconsciously, they were fanning the fires of racial hatred and piling fagots on the blaze.

They seem either to forget or to be unmindful that in the wake of the War between the States, though it left the States of the South overwhelmed, and their fields and cities in ruins and ashes, there arose before the white civilization of that bleeding but proud and undaunted people a menace more threatening than swarming armies and more dreadful than fire and pillage.

With their own governments superseded, with their citizens disfranchised, and millions of blacks with ballots in their hands, their eyes rested upon a forbidding prospect.

Agitations incited and kindled by unprincipled and selfish meddlers from the North, then and during all the years till now, have inspired among some unattainable ambitions for social equality, have inflamed their hatred of the dominant race and have embittered the relations of the races.

But the South did not despair—her people were made of sterner stuff. From the dust proud cities grew. Her fields were decked again in their garments of green and gold and once more flung wide their banners of white. But she has struggled and she has suffered. Hers has been a problem peculiar to itself. She understands it better than any other part of the Union, because it is her own. She merits the sympathy not the condemnation of other sections. The negro is not denied the opportunity to labor and accumulate property. His industrial rights have greater security in the South than elsewhere. His rights in the courts are guaranteed. But social equality is denied him; not by law in violation of the fourteenth amendment, but by the irrepealable statutes that throb in the white man's pulse, by the inviolate constitution of our race.

Yes, lynchings have occurred. They are to be deplored. They are not to be defended. The Southern people are bending their energies to suppress them. But the South is not the only place where lynchings have occurred. With far less provocation they have occurred elsewhere, and may occur again. East St. Louis, with its toll of about an hundred; Omaha, with its race riots; Washington itself, are only a few of the points in other sections where violence provoked by racial conflict has defied authority.

If such outbursts have occurred with greater frequency in the South, it is because there so frequently have been perpetrated those fiendish and unspeakable crimes upon helpless women and children—crimes of brutish beasts; crimes that freeze the heart and yet fire the blood till it boils with wrath; crimes whose horror reaches down into the uttermost depths of human consciousness and touches into life the elemental passions that rend and kill in defense of woman and child.

It is the same fierce force that abides in the breast of him who dwells in the city or rides in the bosom of the wild nomad of the desert. It is the same when it cleaves the heart of the paleface as, standing in his doorway, he looks upon the mangled and violated form of wife or child, as when it moves the red man to avenge the outrage of his tepee. It is the same desperate tempest, whether to-day it sweeps men to madness or whether it drive Virginius to slay his daughter that she may be saved from the foul and dishonoring touch of a Roman tyrant.

But we rejoice that there are many in the West and North that are coming to appreciate and understand our problem. We take courage that not all in this Chamber from other sections have voiced their hostility and lack of sympathy. We have a greater interest in its solution than any other part of the Union. To us settlement will bring happiness—the greatest possible reward. To the professional political exploiter of the negro it will bring dismay. If selfish and mischievous agitators will only cease inculcating in the negro mind fancied wrongs, if white encouragement be withdrawn from negroes in northern cities, who live on funds fleeced from trusting negroes of the South and give them in return evil counsel and impossible hopes, we shall draw nearer to racial adjustment. If trouble makers will but turn their preachment to the colored race from political and social relations, toward instilling in that race observance of law, good citizenship, industrial education, industry, and frugality, the black man will move far down the pathway that leads to happiness—along that roadway the gates stand ajar. To the social highway the gates are closed, and closed they shall remain.

The people and the States of the South will struggle on with their burden. They will continue to endeavor to suppress lynching; they are improving now, and will continue to improve. But they still cling to the Constitution. They still reverence its ideals. They still respect its limitations. They are opposed to lynching persons guilty of crime. They are opposed to lynching the Constitution, which has committed no crime. They believe that if the American system is to be preserved the Constitution must be obeyed; its faith must be kept.

Far from Europe, and yet farther from the East, here on the frontiers of the western world the great experiment in self-government under a written Constitution was begun—here the Anglo Saxon, with 600 years of struggle for freedom flowing in his veins, hungering to satisfy the aspirations of 20 generations, set up this governmental system. More than a hundred years ago, gathering courage from its example, France tore from her cramped and festering limbs the shackles of centuries. A little later the colonies of South America, walking in her footsteps, emerged from their thralldom. The monarchies of Europe have been awakened and liberalized by the radiance of the American system. For 133 years the United States, under the Constitution, has served not alone its own children but the world. But its work has not yet reached its fullness. To be worthy of its high destiny—the vindication of a written constitutional system—it must be true to that ideal. We, its servants, must reverence and obey its forms and processes. The people expect us, their servants, to reverence it and obey its commands. They look upon the Constitution as the great barrier between their liberties and tyranny. Its covenants, they fancy, have preserved for them and their children what was wrested by turbulent barons from an unwilling king. Through its lines they see woven the brave spirit of a Parliament that dared defy the Crown. To them it throbs with the spirit of that ringing Declaration that circled the globe and thrilled a world. In its stately stanzas they catch the echo of a drumbeat and hear the tramp of Continental Armies as their ragged battalions drove the royal standard from these shores. To them its language holds the wisdom of Benjamin Franklin, it reflects the statesmanship of James Madison, and majestically moving through its pages are the calm courage and lofty patriotism of Washington. These still live in the Constitution. If it be lost, all is lost.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am unable to escape the conviction that from the beginning of the debate upon this question until now there has been much of beclouding and befogging the real issue which is involved. The "race question" has been discussed much throughout this debate and yet the fundamental features of this bill do not in anywise involve the "race question." That is only an incident growing out of the peculiar conditions existing in the country. I had supposed that we here all understood it. My fear has been that the country did not understand it. And I may now say that certain practices which have been pursued by the minority have been pursued, not in an effort to delay consideration of this bill, but in an effort to center the attention of the country upon the real meaning and upon the real things that are involved in it.

But I am reluctantly driven to the conclusion that even here in the minds of some the issue is beclouded and befogged. The clear-minded, the clear-thinking gentlemen from New York [Mr. COCKRAN and Mr. GRIFFIN], who have this morning spoken in advocacy of this measure, after all do not seem to understand it. Do these gentlemen realize that when they vote for this bill they are voting to put the whole police force of their city and State absolutely under the control of the Federal Government? Are they willing to tell the House and the country that the great city of New York, the great city of Chicago, or any other city or hamlet in this country, is willing to place its police officers under the control of the Federal Government, with a Federal constabulary to enforce their will upon the local police force? I dare not think so.

The "race question" ought not to becloud the issue. The responsibility with which we Members of the House are faced, which we upon our consciences must respond to, is first the constitutionality of this measure. Then we may take up the question of policy. As yet I have not heard in this debate one gentleman, unless it be the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KNIGHT], who preceded me a moment ago, and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who has not expressed the very gravest doubt as to its constitutionality. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN], the brilliant and distinguished orator, known throughout the world, conceded in the presence of this body that from beginning to end this bill is unconstitutional. And yet he announced that he would support it.

In the discussion upon the rule, the only time that I have spoken upon this subject, I endeavored seriously and calmly to point out the involvements of this question.

Gentlemen, if this bill can be passed and sustained as constitutional, then it is admitted by every Member of the House who has spoken that you can put the punishment for any crime in the Federal organism, to the exclusion of the State entities. And in the process of the years, of the decades, with the changing evolutions of our social organism throughout this vast domain, we may expect a sentiment to grow up which inevitably will lead to that thing being done.

I have been very painfully surprised at the attitude of some of the Representatives from the Pacific Coast States upon this bill, not that it is a matter of graver consequence to them than to all the other States, save only as the peculiar problem which confronts those of the western coast is coming more quickly than the problems will come to other States.

Do not gentlemen from the Pacific coast know that when the effort was made to enforce the admission of the Japanese into their schools by Federal action where the sympathy with them in their determination that it should not be done came from? [Applause.] Can gentlemen from the western coast, who are confronted with a racial problem, fail to realize that in a very few years, if this bill shall pass and be sustained by the court, an overwhelming majority of representatives from other sections of this country, in order to avoid the dangers of war, will rise up and crush their just local institutions and practices on the western coast in regard to their schools and their alien land laws?

You gentlemen of the majority may very well think very seriously.

It is no threat. God knows, my friends from the western coast, whatever the other sections may say and do about this question, and whatever you yourselves may do upon this matter, you will not lose the sympathy of us who understand the problem. [Applause.]

This measure is confessedly in violation of the Constitution of the United States. I do not believe there is a lawyer in this Republic, with any pretensions to constitutional law education, who is devoid of political aspiration, who will rise anywhere in the Republic and undertake to defend its constitutionality. And if we can but center the attention of the bar of this country, if we can but center the attention of the officers of the States and of the municipalities who are to be brought within the purview of this act, if we can but center the attention of the great masses of people upon the fact that here, by this law, not by constitutional amendment, where they will have a chance to pass upon its merits, but by law of Congress, we are to destroy the Constitution and to do violence to all the philosophy upon which our dual systems of government rest, we will be ready to meet that issue, those of us who oppose this bill.

This is no temporary thing. This is not dealing with an unfortunate condition only. This is a proposition which in its fundamentals must be abhorrent to every man who believes in the integrity of our dual systems of government, no matter whether it be in New York or New England or Florida or California.

Gentlemen have sought to compare this bill with the prohibition act. Oh, Mr. Chairman, there is no comparison between the two. Whether it was wise or unwise to adopt the eighteenth amendment, we need not now argue. It was submitted by Congress as a constitutional amendment. It did not supplant the States in the enforcement of law. It was submitted. The people of the States through their representatives, the constitutional agencies, had the opportunity to pass upon it. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] complained that the South in the main voted for it, and they seek to saddle the responsibility for it upon the South. I have seen such an opinion as that in the press of New York. And yet the State of New York itself ratified the amendment overwhelmingly. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The question of the constitutionality of this bill at this stage is, after all, a matter of opinion. The gentleman realizes it has been submitted to the Attorney General, and that he has given his opinion that this measure is constitutional?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. An assistant to the Attorney General argued before the Committee on the Judiciary that he hoped if it was passed he might be able to get the court to sustain it. That was as strong as he put it.

But let me say to my friend from Ohio—I do not know what was in his mind when he took the oath to support the Constitution of the United States; I did not take an oath to support the Attorney General of the United States; I took an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman apparently took an oath to uphold his own opinion. I think the opinion of the Attorney General is at least entitled to respect.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What does the gentleman think about the constitutionality of it? [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman places very great reliance upon the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Well, I shall not undertake to interpret the gentleman's opinion to the House. He will have to do it himself.

Let me repeat as seriously as I can, this is no race question. We ought to forget every element of raciality which has been injected into this discussion. We ought to consider this first from its constitutional standpoint, and then from the standpoint of the policy which is involved and the precedent which it sets, through which, as sure as God reigns and society continues to move, the whole dual system of government which exists here will eventually be destroyed if this bill shall pass. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. APPLEBY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey is recognized for one minute.

Mr. APPLEBY. Mr. Chairman, on account of the shortness of time, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ECHOLS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for one minute.

Mr. ECHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request as the gentleman from New Jersey.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANSORGE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for one minute.

Mr. HERRICK. I object.

Mr. ANSORGE. Mr. Chairman, the House has already heard me for 10 minutes. I merely ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KOPP].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for one minute.

Mr. KOPP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. ROBSION. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, how much more time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas has 12 minutes remaining. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has 16 minutes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield four minutes of his time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have heard a thousand lawyers say that certain bills and laws are unconstitutional. I never saw a half a dozen who were able to convince any court that they were. When a man says a bill is unconstitutional, the chances are one thousand to one that he is wrong.

APPLICATION OF THE EDISON TEST.

There has never been a law predicated on the fact that a State refuses a man protection. Therefore there never has been a decision that such a law is unconstitutional. If there were such a decision it would be a mere obiter dictum. Any lawyer who will give the principle involved 30 minutes' serious consideration will concede that there has never been any decision that this bill is unconstitutional.

The cases gentlemen cite are concerning laws which did not contain any provision that the State had refused to do its duty. In those cases the Supreme Court has frequently said that those laws were unconstitutional because they were not predicated upon the fact that the State had refused to give people protection. The inference is that this bill, which is predicated on the claim that the State has refused to give men equal protection, is constitutional. Therefore there are many decisions which tend to support the constitutionality of this bill.

A careful review of the speeches delivered during this debate sheds considerable light upon the actual plans of the friends and foes of this bill. While there has been a vast amount of sounding of trumpets and beating of drums to distract attention from the issues and to fill in space there are certain cardinal points definitely developed. An analysis of the argument shows that there are after all just two major contentions involved.

THE TWO CONTENTIONS.

1. One side calls attention to the fact that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to every man in each State the equal protection of its laws, and makes it the duty of Congress to carry out that guaranty whenever a State by its sheriff or other officers denies the benefit of that guaranty to anybody. This side takes the position that the Constitution means what it says.

2. The other side advances the claim that under the Constitution each State has a reserved power to permit its citizens to hang people and burn people whenever in their judgment it should be done, and that they can do this without any officious interference from the Government of the United States.

Gentlemen must not deceive themselves, thinking that they are against lynching, but also against this bill. Those who want the State to reserve the power to allow their citizens to pour oil on people and burn them alive at their own sweet will, will vote against this bill. Those who are in favor of enforcing this constitutional provision will vote for the bill, and that is all there is at stake in this debate.

Perhaps the clearest enunciation of the views of those opposing the antilynching bill is expressed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] in his speech of January 10, where he says:

"THE LAST VESTIGE OF THEIR RIGHTS GONE."

Section 4 removes the last vestige of the rights of the citizens of the several States. It provides that a person who participates in any mob or riotous assemblage by which a person is put to death shall be guilty of a felony, and on conviction thereof may be imprisoned for life.

The gentleman from Maine says that if they can not burn somebody alive they will not have a right left.

The gentleman thus says that section 4 provides that any one who participates in a mob by which a person is put to death, on conviction may be imprisoned for life, and that this "removes the last vestige of the rights of the citizens of the several States." Congress merely seeks to enforce the law of Maine and adds nothing to its punishment of the men in the gentleman's district who commit murder at a lynching bee.

The gentleman from Maine thinks that when a State can not allow its citizens to burn each other alive without trial it has "lost the last vestige of its rights." He states the view of his side more clearly and brutally than anyone else would or could.

You will think that this is a misprint. But he used it in both his speeches. The poor gentleman fondly thinks it is a literary and legal gem, and will ring down the ages. It will if I can help ring it.

His is a clear statement of the contention I have directed his attention to. The "last vestige of the rights of the citizen" is the alleged power reserved in the States of allowing their citizens to burn people occasionally without any interference by the Federal Government. As the gentleman so tersely says, this bill, if it becomes a law, will deprive the States of that alleged reserved power and of that "last vestige of their right" to burn each other without a trial, to which the gentleman from Maine and his colleagues so fondly cling. That is the constitutional question involved here.

The dispute is clear-cut and definite and a decision can not be escaped. One side is right and the other is wrong. Men of logical minds who believe that it is best to burn a man occasionally will be one way, and men of logical minds who believe that every man ought to have a fair trial will believe the other way. Occasionally a dignified gentleman profoundly remarks that there is a grave doubt about which is correct, and thus demonstrates, some people think, a judicial mind; but, gentlemen, a judicial mind does not have "grave doubts" after it has heard the law and the evidence. Then a judicial mind, a logical mind, reaches a conclusion, and if it can not reach a conclusion it is not a judicial mind nor much of any other kind of a mind. Do not fool yourselves, gentlemen, into imagining that you can look wise and hold "grave doubts" and still be logical. This issue is so clean-cut, so definitely defined, that there is no escape from reaching one conclusion or the other. Every man here is entitled to be governed by his own judgment. If your judgment convinces you that mobs should be permitted sometimes to hang people without a trial you should vote that way, but do not deceive yourselves into thinking that there is any other issue in this debate.

In good old days of long ago, the friends of freedom and human rights found the Yankee Doughfaces worse than the Southern slave drivers. The rule still holds. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] suggests that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] "has the misfortune to have in his district a large organization of colored voters." And then intimates that the argument of the gentleman from Ohio is governed by that fact. The gentleman from Maine then proceeds with the following:

> The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who also represents a large colored constituency, entered the fray as a great constitutional lawyer and claimed on the floor that this bill was clearly constitutional, because he had examined certain decisions which had not met the eye of any other lawyer, and he proceeded at great length to quote from certain State decisions which had never been before the Supreme Court.

He says:

> The gentleman from Kansas proceeded at great length to quote from certain State decisions which had never been before the Supreme Court.

Is this ignorance or mendacity? Every decision the gentleman from Kansas mentioned was from the United States Supreme Court reports. The gentleman from Kansas did not even mention any State decision. How does a man who could make such a statement get the idea, or something, that he is called on to discuss any legal proposition? He said that the gentleman from Kansas cited "certain decisions which have never met the eye of any other lawyer." Of course, I realize a man who can not tell a State decision from a United States Supreme Court case has a right to discuss the law. What puzzles me is why should he wish to.

Nearly every case the gentleman from Kansas mentioned was a case that had already been cited by the opponents of the bill, who claimed that it sustained their contentions. The gentleman from Kansas undertook to demonstrate that not a single one of those cases sustained their theory. The gentleman from Maine says they "had never met the eye" of any lawyer but the Kansan. Well, they certainly had never met his eye, whether he is a lawyer or not. He says:

> I do say, however, that I have not been able to find any case cited by the gentleman from Kansas that does apply.

LATHER TOO VALUABLE.

After reading his speech it is perfectly obvious that this is true, and that he is not able to find the application of the cases. He says that they are State cases, which means that he never read them, of course, and as he never read them, how does he know whether they apply? It is a compliment to some people to tell them they know no law. He does not even suspicion any.

The gentleman from Maine, as it seems, has done some "independent research" of his own and actually introduces cases he has discovered. But why should anyone discuss them after reading what he said above? Lather is too valuable to waste on such an operation.

Referring to the Siebold case, the gentleman from Maine enters into a "legal discussion" of that. He says:

> There was a Federal statute covering elections of Members of Congress and punishing any interference with the proper conduct and purity of the elections, and under that statute the defendant was arrested and tried in the United States court. It was clearly a Federal offense made not only so by Congress but by the Constitution.

It evidently never has occurred to the gentleman that if this bill becomes a law those who violate it will be arrested and tried in the United States court for a Federal offense made so by Congress and the Constitution. Yes; they had a Federal statute and we will have another when this bill passes. Why, this is pitiable. Let us proceed with the debate and drop a veil over this sad occurrence.

In his curious hallucinations the gentleman said that the gentleman from Nebraska claimed that the gentleman from Kansas had quoted a vast number of cases, but that none of them applied to the bill in question.

As the gentlemen from Maine and Nebraska abandon the cause of human rights and cater to its foes, they remind me of the Come-outers toast to Webster and Winthrop under similar circumstances. Changing the names, it runs:

HERSEY and REAVIS, par nobile fratrum, like the lean kine in the field they follow the sunshine around the haystack.

That the gentleman from Nebraska made a clever speech is proved by the fact that he spoke for 30 minutes and carefully kept the secret of whether he was in favor of maintaining in the States a reserved power to permit its citizens to burn a man alive, whenever it seemed proper, without any officious interference by the Federal Government. However, it may be presumed that his heart was where his applause was; but this is the first time in the annals of Nebraska on this floor, when the political opinions of any orator from that Commonwealth have received and deserved the sympathetic applause of the rebel yell.

"NO POLITICAL EXPEDIENCY OR SELF-INTEREST."

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] tells us himself that he never casts any vote from political expediency or self-interest, which is a very good advertisement of himself. I had supposed that that was the rule in the House, but he evidently thinks he is an exception. He certainly is an exception to some rules, as we will now see. For example, in his speech of January 10 the gentleman from Kansas did not mention section 4, and said of James against Bowman that it "has no relation to the thirteenth or fourteenth amendments." The gentleman from Nebraska said the Kansan cited James against Bowman "with approval as showing section 4 * * * was within the fourteenth amendment. Applause." That stamps him as an "exception." In his speech of January 17, which immediately followed that of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], he said:

> I want to refer to the question that was interposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who made a very brilliant speech on the constitutionality of this measure, citing a number of decisions of the United States Supreme Court. Every one of which absolutely repudiated everything that he said. [Laughter.]

I do not find that in his speech in the RECORD, where he says:

> I hope to answer the question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], who made a brilliant constitutional argument for the bill and cited many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, every one of which when understood, destroyed the very principle for which he contended. [Laughter.]
> Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield?
> Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.
> Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman be kind enough to read them. Evidently he has not.
> Mr. REAVIS. I will be glad to read one of them now, the case of James against Bowman, reported in the One hundred and ninetieth United States Reports.

While the gentleman's diction is not the same, he still retains "Laughter," and I think he is entirely justified in doing so. He earned that laughter. Anybody who can draw "laughter" and "applause" handling James vs. Bowman the way he did, is entitled to have it engraved on his tomb.

If the statement above of the eloquent gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] is true, the citations given by the gentleman from Kansas are of no value and should be discarded. If the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska above is not true, it is simply the silly prattle of a man who does not know what he is talking about, and the decisions can well be read with care. The primary essential for being useful in debate is a certain capacity for the assimilation of actual facts. Let us focus our eyes on this James against Bowman production of the gentleman from Nebraska and see whether we can place reliance upon his statement about what a court has said.

He says, not in the green tree of the floor but in the brown and yellow leaf of the RECORD:

> Mr. REAVIS. The gentleman asked for the reading of the opinion. Will he please listen? I select this case from among the many cited by the gentleman to prove the constitutionality of this bill, not alone because it is the leading case construing the fourteenth amendment, but because it was written by a very distinguished judge from the gentleman's own State. Will you listen to what Judge Brewer says with reference to the jurisdiction of the Federal Government under the fourteenth amendment?

The gentleman begins by saying that he reads this case because the citation was written by Justice Brewer in James against Bowman. It was not written by Justice Brewer in James against Bowman. His citation, which he ascribes to Brewer, was written by Chief Justice Waite in the United States against Cruikshank, and will be found in the Ninety-second United States at page 554. The gentleman does not know enough about these cases to know who wrote his citation or in what case it was delivered. Why does he argue, then, when his equipment is such as that? He says that he cites it because Justice Brewer wrote it. He cited it because he did not know the name of any other single, solitary case that the gentleman from Kansas mentioned in his speech on this question, as I shall presently demonstrate.

He says, too, he cited it—because it is the leading case construing the fourteenth amendment.

The case of James against Bowman is about the fifteenth amendment entirely and does not construe the fourteenth amendment at all. The gentleman wishes us to know what Justice Brewer says. I will see now that you get it. Mr. Justice Brewer, delivering the opinion, begins:

The single question presented for our consideration is whether section 5507 can be upheld as a valid enactment.

If you will turn to section 5507 of the Revised Statutes, you will find that it reads as follows:

SEC. 5507. Every person who prevents, hinders, controls, or intimidates another from exercising or in exercising the right of suffrage, to whom that right is guaranteed by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, by means of bribery or threats of depriving such person of employment or occupation or of ejecting such person from a rented house, lands, or other property, or by threats of refusing to renew leases or contracts for labor, or by threats of violence to himself or family, shall be punished as provided in the preceding section.

The fifteenth amendment provides:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

You will observe that the section which Justice Brewer is construing by his own statement is a section which in its own language explicitly states that it is made under the provisions of the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, and that the construction of that section, made solely under the fifteenth amendment, "is the single question presented" to the court.

"ABSOLUTELY REPUDIATED? LAUGHTER."

The gentleman from Nebraska, coming here to flout the constitutionality of the bill and the Supreme Court decisions cited by the gentleman from Kansas, begins by telling us that the construction by the court of probably the only statute on our law books that specifically says it is enacted entirely under the fifteenth amendment, is the leading case on the fourteenth amendment.

The gentleman from Nebraska says that the gentleman from Kansas presented James against Bowman to sustain section 4 of this bill in his speech of January 10. The gentleman from Kansas did not mention section 4 anywhere in that speech. He said I presented that case to prove that this bill came within the fourteenth amendment. What I said was that James against Bowman had nothing whatever to do with the fourteenth amendment, but was wholly a case on the fifteenth-amendment proposition. He gave a quotation which he said I read to show the bill was constitutional, and I made no such statement about it whatever. Apparently in order to secure an apparent foundation for his oratory, he misrepresented every fact that he touched concerning my attitude on the only case he mentions. Of what value are statements of fact from a debater who misstates every statement made by his opponent on the only case this debater cites?

Having made a desperate effort to break the pledge of the Republican Party, having done all he could to defeat and destroy this bill to abolish the power of mobs to burn people alive, the gentleman from Nebraska announces that he never votes for selfish interests or political expediency and therefore (I presume) is going to retire from this Congress, sticks his speech in his pocket, preens his plumes, and lights out for Nebraska.

He made an omnibus declaration that every case the gentleman from Kansas cited distinctly repudiated what the gentleman from Kansas argued. To sustain that blanket assertion, he gave one quotation, cited one case only. He told you it was "the leading case under the fourteenth amendment," and it is purely a case under the fifteenth amendment. He told you Justice Brewer wrote it, and it was written by Chief Justice Waite. It comes from the United States against Cruikshank, and he told you it was from James against Bowman—where it happened to be cited, as were several other cases. He did not know who wrote his single quotation. He could not name the case in which it was written. He did not understand what constitutional amendment his one case discussed. The gentleman from Nebraska knows no more about the principles involved in these cases than the ass which carried the Savior into Jerusalem knew of the ethics of the Christian religion.

The gentleman tells us that this term in Congress may be his last. If he will return to the practice and combine with his eloquence and shrewdness a careful study of the law, acquiring a broad and definite comprehension thereof as a basis for the exercise of his other talents, I predict for him a splendid career at the bar, which I sincerely hope he may have. He is still young and has ample time to recover from the faults of carelessness and lack of philosophical training. Sometimes one with a superficial knowledge of the law and a gift for bold assertion and denial, without regard to the facts, can go far in the trial courts. A wise countenance and a dignified manner will occasionally be as impressive as brains and learning. In my 35 years of obscure, humble, but industrious practice at the bar I have never before seen such a curious example of the combination of delightful trial talents with an absolute lack of conception of all legal principles. Henry Watterson once said to another very brilliant young gentleman, Mr. Clark Howells, of Atlanta:

Go to, young Bowels, go to; go to school; go to a nunnery, go to the devil.

In his observation of decisions and briefs the eloquent orator from Nebraska has an unfortunate mental astigmatism which probably is very embarrassing to him as well as to his friends. In the speech of January 10 the gentleman from Kansas said:

This case of James against Bowman is made entirely under the fifteenth amendment, and has no relation to the thirteenth or fourteenth.

In his eloquent and inaccurate oration, which he claims is directed to the law of this case, the gentleman from Nebraska says of James against Bowman, which he claims to be reading:

And under the wording of that opinion the gentleman cited it with approval as showing that section 4 predicated upon no action of the State was within the fourteenth amendment. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Kansas said that "the case of James against Bowman has no relation to the fourteenth amendment." The gentleman from Nebraska then said after that that "the gentleman from Kansas cited it to show that section 4 was within the fourteenth amendment," as proven by this James against Bowman case. The gentleman from Kansas says one thing, and the gentleman from Nebraska says that he says another thing, the exact opposite. In my remarks on James against Bowman I called attention to a few lines it cited from the Civil Rights cases, and the gentleman quoted a few lines I did not mention under James against Bowman, and claimed I quoted them to prove James against Bowman sustained section 4, which I did not mention in the whole speech.

I have spoken of this as a mental astigmatism, but perhaps there are other words for it. I think such misrepresentation has gone far enough.

The gentleman from Kansas addressed this House in some 8,000 words as to the constitutionality of this bill without an unkind word of any human being or any unkind thought of any human being. Most of the Supreme Court cases he cited were cited again a week later by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. Not a man in the world has undertaken to take any given case and seriously demonstrate that it did not tend to prove the contention of the gentleman from Kansas, yet these gentlemen without a decision to sustain their views, without citing a line from any of the cases the gentleman produced—except this citation from Justice Waite which they ascribe to Justice Brewer, and which sustains the constitutionality of this bill—have assumed judicial authority to announce in an omnibus presentation the judicial pronouncement that none of the cases the gentleman from Kansas cites sustains his contention, but that they all repudiate it. As neither of the gentlemen have read them, as neither of them understand any principle involved, it certainly is astonishing that they could not have restrained their transports in the hysterical enthusiasm of repudiating the principles of their party, to the ordinary rules of common courtesy and common sense.

SOME OF THE CASES IN DISPUTE.

As the gentlemen from Maine and Nebraska have hardly told us a word of what is in the cases they so summarily disposed of, it will be well to analyze a few and refreshen our memories as to their contents.

CIVIL RIGHTS CASES.
(109 U. S., 3, 13.)

One of the strongest cases in favor of the constitutionality of this bill is in One hundred and ninth United States, pages 3 and 13, and, curiously enough, men actually cite it as being a decision against the bill. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] speaks of it as one of the strongest cases against the bill. The best way to do is to lay it before you and put it into the RECORD, so every man can judge for himself. It is my hope that those who use the RECORD can read and understand English, and that is all that will be necessary.

The syllabus of this case says:

The fourteenth amendment is prohibitory upon the States only, and the legislation authorized to be adopted by Congress for enforcing it is not direct legislation on the matters respecting which the States are prohibited from making or enforcing certain laws or doing certain acts, but is corrective legislation, such as may be necessary or proper for counteracting and redressing the effect of such laws or acts.

This means that the fourteenth amendment is prohibitory upon the States, not upon the Nation. This means that Congress is authorized to legislate to enforce this amendment. This means that Congress can make such legislation "as may be necessary or proper for counteracting and redressing the effect" of the acts or laws the State does or makes. The Supreme Court distinctly says that laws like this bill, intended to counteract and redress, are corrective in their character and not direct. Is it possible that there is anybody in the world who fails to see that this is an absolute declaration by the Supreme Court that the act correcting the acts of the sheriff and the State exactly authorizes just what this bill does? Why should anybody in the world say this is a strong case against the bill, which undertakes to correct the misconduct of the sheriff and the State? Why, there certainly must be some limit to an undertaking to answer such a case as that by denying that it means what it says. The Supreme Court says in the Civil Rights cases, page 13:

And so in the present case, until some State law has been passed, or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity, for the prohibitions of the amendment are against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may, and should be, provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises; but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against; and that is, State laws, or State action of some kind, adverse to the rights of the citizen secured by the amendment.

In fine, the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt in this behalf is not general legislation upon the rights of the citizen, but corrective legislation; that is, such as may be necessary and proper for counteracting such laws as the States may adopt or enforce, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from making or enforcing, or such acts and proceedings as the States may commit or take, and which, by the amendment, they are prohibited from committing or taking.

The Supreme Court then holds that since these two sections are not predicated upon any misconduct by the State they are unconstitutional. It says:

Is the Constitution violated until the denial of the right has some State sanction or authority?

The Supreme Court held that until the State has denied, the provision is not constitutional. But this is equivalent to saying that if the State made a law denying men equal privileges in a hotel, the Congress of the United States could enact legislation to correct that. It is curious that the antagonists of this bill should cite attention to such a decision. Men of good sense let sleeping dogs lie.

These statements by the Supreme Court are clear and definite, and it is idle to quibble with them and undertake to deny that they mean what they say. The court speaks of "the legislation which Congress is authorized to adopt," and it is whatever "may be necessary."

The court holds that sections 1 and 2 of the civil rights bill are unconstitutional, but that has nothing to do with this matter.

The first section they held unconstitutional says that all people in the United States shall have full enjoyment of hotels and the like. The second section says that any person who shall violate the foregoing section by denying to any citizen this kind of enjoyment shall be punished. The Supreme Court held that Congress could not make such a law as that because there was nothing to show that any State has denied those privileges to anybody. As a matter of fact, what that meant was that any time any State by its laws or by the conduct of its officers refused any person equal enjoyment of public inns, the Congress could make the law which was held unconstitutional. It is a little curious that anybody who is opposed to such legislation should have forced our attention to this fact. Some people never can let well enough alone, but when they get something they are not entitled to always cry for more.

In this Civil Rights case the Supreme Court says of the fourteenth amendment:

It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty, and property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the laws. It not only does this but in order that the national will, thus declared, may not be a mere brutum fulmen, the last section of the amendment invests Congress with power to enforce it by appropriate legislation. To enforce what? To enforce the prohibition. To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts, and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it. It does not invest Congress with power to legislate upon subjects which are within the domain of State legislation, but to provide modes of relief against State legislation or State action of the kind referred to. It does not authorize Congress to create a code of municipal law for the regulation of private rights, but to provide modes of redress against the operation of State laws and the action of State officers, executive or judicial, when these are subversive of the fundamental rights specified in the amendment.

Positive rights and privileges are undoubtedly secured by the fourteenth amendment; but they are secured by way of prohibition against State laws and State proceedings affecting those rights and privileges, and by power given to Congress to legislate for the purpose of carrying such prohibition into effect.

And such legislation must necessarily be predicated upon such supposed State laws or State proceedings, and be directed to the correction of their operation and effect. A quite full discussion of this aspect of the amendment may be found in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542); Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313); and Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 339).

In this Civil Rights case the court says of the law it declared unconstitutional:

THE TROUBLE IN THE CIVIL RIGHTS CASE.

An inspection of the law shows that it makes no reference whatever to any supposed or apprehended violation of the fourteenth amendment on the part of the States. It is not predicated on any such view. It proceeds ex directo to declare that certain acts committed by individuals shall be deemed offenses and shall be prosecuted and punished by proceedings in the courts of the United States. It does not profess to be corrective of any constitutional wrong committed by the States; it does not make its operation to depend upon any such wrong committed. It applies equally to cases arising in States which have the justest laws respecting the personal rights of citizens, and whose authorities are ever ready to enforce such laws, as to those which arise in States that may have violated the prohibition of the amendment. In other words, it steps into the domain of local jurisprudence and lays down rules for the conduct of individuals in society toward each other, and imposes sanctions for the enforcement of those rules without referring in any manner to any supposed action of the State or its authorities.

This present bill is entirely predicated upon the attitude of the State and comes entirely within the decision on the Civil Rights case so as to make it a good bill.

Some more "repudiation [laughter]." The laughter-arousing gentleman from Nebraska speaks with great approval of the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who says, "I now come to the cases which are altogether favorable to this class of legislation," and then proceeds to quote from Strauder v. West Virginia (100 U. S., 310), Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 347), In re Siebold (100 U. S., 371), and holds them up as "altogether favorable." The gentleman from Nebraska's speech immediately followed that of the gentleman from Ohio, and he naturally heard him cite those cases. The gentleman from Nebraska sat directly in front of the gentleman from Kansas when he spoke on January 10, just a week before. The gentleman from Ohio cited the same cases just mentioned that the gentleman from Kansas had cited. The gentleman from Nebraska thought it was quite profound law when he heard it from the gentleman from Ohio, but when the gentleman from Kansas cited the Strauder case and the Virginia case and the Siebold case the week before, the gentleman from Nebraska gravely announced that every one of them "absolutely repudiated [laughter]" the argument of the gentleman from Kansas, though he had just a moment before heard them cited as supporting the constitutionality of the bill. Perhaps this was another mental astigmatism; but the real fact is that the gentleman from Nebraska had so little familiarity with this proceeding that he could not have told you whether anybody had cited the Strauder case or the Siebold case or the Ex parte Virginia case. When he said that those cases "absolutely repudiated [laughter]" the law suggested by the gentleman from Kansas he could not have named one of them, any more than he could have named the babes that were lost in the woods. And yet this gentleman, who did not know enough about their names even to realize that both these gentlemen had cited the same cases, entered a general blanket denial of the application of any of them. A gentleman who did not know the names of the cases might know more law than a lawyer who thought United States Supreme Court cases were State decisions, but he certainly did not have any more warrant to discuss them. What he thought was that his high-sounding and rolling declamation would go unchallenged and nobody would ever know that he did not know that he was in deep water, far beyond his depth.

The cases when cited by the gentleman from Kansas were just as "altogether favorable" to the bill as they were when cited by the gentleman from Ohio just a week later.

UNITED STATES v. CRUIKSHANK.
(92 U. S., 542, 554, 555.)

In this case, cited by both the gentlemen from Ohio and Kansas, the syllabus says, speaking of the fourteenth amendment:

The duty of protecting all its citizens in the enjoyment of an equality of rights was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

This decision says that it is the duty of the United States to enforce the guaranty in the fourteenth amendment, which is what this bill is drawn to do, and what it will do. The court says:

The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power.

This case was cited by the opposition as holding the bill unconstitutional. The gentleman from Kansas cited it to call attention to the statement of the court that it is the duty of Congress to carry out this constitutional guaranty. Why does the gentleman from Nebraska say that it "absolutely repudiates [laughter]" just what it says? The gentleman from Ohio, in his argument citing this case, calls attention to the statement of the Supreme Court that the people are subject to two Governments, the State and the National.

That is what this bill says, and it says that when the State will not protect them the National Government will, and that it will not repudiate them, and that those who believe in the Constitution of the United States should not repudiate them.

STRAUDER v. WEST VIRGINIA.
(100 U. S., 303, 310.)

Another case cited by the gentleman from Kansas is Strauder against West Virginia, concerning which the gentleman from Kansas made no remark, merely giving the views of the court, which said:

The fourteenth amendment not only gave citizenship and the privileges of citizenship to persons of color but denied to any State the power to withhold from them equal protection, and invested Congress with power, by appropriate legislation, to enforce its provisions.

While the gentleman from Kansas did not argue that proposition, it was because he took it for granted that everybody who had qualifications that would admit him to the bar would see at a glance that this sustained the constitutionality of this bill, and expressly says that the State's citizens must have the equal protection of the laws, and that Congress could enforce that by appropriate legislation. It then remains for Congress to decide that this bill is appropriate legislation, and it is sustained by the Strauder case. Indeed, the Strauder case cites a much older case, and says:

A right or an immunity, whether created by the Constitution or only sustained by it, even without any express delegation of power, may be protected by Congress. (Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Peters, 539.)

This valuable decision from the sixteenth Peters, which is cited in the Strauder case, is a very old one and goes far to sustain the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] that perhaps under its general powers, long before the fourteenth amendment, Congress had power to make this bill. The gentleman from Nebraska, of course, never heard of the case and wants us to infer that because the court said that Congress can protect the people without any express delegation of power, that means that the decision "absolutely repudiates [laughter]" the belief of the gentleman from Kansas that the bill is constitutional. But the Strauder case continues:

So in the United States v. Reese it was said by the chief justice of this court:

UNITED STATES v. REESE.
(92 U. S., 214.)

Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and the manner of the protection may be such as Congress in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected.

Then the Strauder case continues:

But there is express authority to protect the rights and immunities referred to in the fourteenth amendment and to enforce observance of them by appropriate legislation.

The gentleman from Kansas did not argue about either the Reese case or the Strauder case in his speech of January 10. He supposed that any lawyer could make his own deduction and inference, and he still believes that any "lawyer" can, if he will read it. The preposterous assertion, without any knowledge of the case by the gentleman from Nebraska, that the Reese and Strauder cases "absolutely repudiate [laughter]" any claim of constitutionality for this bill is not entitled to the consideration the gentleman from Kansas has given it.

That a member of the Judiciary Committee, in the discussion of a legal proposition, should come before the House and make such wild, preposterous, and sweeping assertions, is a grave injustice to the House. We have a right to expect members of that committee to cite the law to us correctly, and make no sweeping assertions unless they have verified a basis for such declarations.

UNITED STATES v. HARRIS.
(106 U. S., 629–639.)

In this case the Supreme Court of the United States held that as long as the State did its duty and every man in it was afforded the equal protection of its laws, Congress could not act under the fourteenth amendment by which the United States guarantees that equal protection.

Following the customary course of reasoning among people of ordinary good sense, the gentleman from Kansas reached the conclusion that this was practically equivalent to having said that whenever a State refused to do its duty and refused giving the equal protection of its laws to all, Congress can act, and should act.

The brilliant lawyer from Nebraska takes the position that when the Supreme Court said in the Harris case that Congress could not act if the States gave them all equal protection, it meant that Congress could not act if the States refused them equal protection. The gentleman from Nebraska says that while the gentleman from Kansas cited the Harris case as supporting the constitutionality of the bill, it was one of those "which absolutely repudiated everything that he said [laughter]." His deduction is that when the court said that Congress can not act if the State does its duty, that "absolutely repudiates [laughter]" the deduction that the converse was true, and that it meant that Congress can not act, whatever the State does.

The average man learns that the sun has come up every day for a thousand years, and he says cheerfully, "It will come up to-morrow." The gentleman from Nebraska gets a different deduction. He would say, "Oh, yes; that sun has been up every morning for a thousand years, but it won't be up to-morrow; this thing can't go on forever; there must be some limit to it." The deductions made by brilliant lawyers like that and just ordinary lawyers differ sometimes.

VIRGINIA v. RIVES.
(100 U. S., 313.)

This is one of the cases cited by opponents of the bill as proving its unconstitutionality. The gentleman from Kansas showed that it made no suggestion that even hinted at the unconstitutionality of this bill and called attention to the statements in it which strongly tended to indicate this bill was constitutional. The gentleman from Nebraska has this case in mind as one of those under which he said:

The gentleman from Kansas, who made a very brilliant speech on the constitutionality of the measure, citing a number of decisions of the United States Supreme Court, every one of which absolutely repudiated everything that he said. [Laughter.]

As I have said, the gentleman from Nebraska has a slight mental astigmatism, and it has been suggested to me that when he says "repudiated" he means "demonstrated." If we can judge from his deductions and arguments, this would explain his statement.

In Virginia against Rives the syllabus says:

A State may exert her authority through different agencies, and those prohibitions extend to her action denying equal protection of the laws, whether it be action by one of these agencies or by another. Congress, by virtue of the fifth section of the fourteenth amendment, may enforce the prohibitions whenever they are disregarded by either the legislative, the executive, or the judicial departments of the State. The mode of enforcement is left to its discretion.

The gentleman from Kansas said that this meant that if the sheriff or any other agent of the State denied equal protection of the laws to anybody, Congress may enforce the prohibition, and that the court said that the mode of its enforcement is left to the "discretion" of Congress. The reason the gentleman from Kansas said that was because that was what the Supreme Court said. The interesting gentleman from Nebraska says that when the Supreme Court announced in Virginia against Rives that Congress could enforce the fourteenth amendment according to its own discretion whenever a State denied protection, that was a total repudiation of the claim of the gentleman from Kansas that this statement meant what it said. There is one nice thing about the argument of the gentleman from Nebraska—he does not waste a minute saying one word to indicate that there is any reason for his conclusion. He just says that when the Supreme Court says that January is the first month of the year, that is an "absolute repudiation [laughter]" of the claim by the gentleman from Kansas that January is the first month of the year. That the gentleman from Nebraska never read that case is self-evident, and that he never knew its name is a fair deduction.

THE ARGUMENT OF JANUARY 10.

On January 10 the gentleman from Kansas called the attention of the House to the cases cited by the opposition in support of their contention. He undertook to demonstrate that there was not a sentence in any of them which sustained their theory, and that many of them sustained the claim that this bill is constitutional. As not one single, solitary sentence was quoted by anybody from any case to answer his conclusion, except the one the gentleman from Nebraska lost in the mist, and as the only answer anybody undertook to make was simply a bold and vigorous general denial, we may reasonably conclude that there was some basis for the claim of the gentleman from Kansas. He hardly undertook to go further than that and had not the time to do more. There are other cases in support of our view, among them Yick Wo v. Hopkins (118 U. S., 356), Logan v. United States (144 U. S., 263), In re Debs (158 U. S., 564), Home Telephone v. Los Angeles (227 U. S., 278), Chicago v. Sturges (222 U. S., 323), Buchanan v. Warey (245 U. S., 60), Hamilton v. Kentucky Co. (251 U. S., 146), Railroad v. Bosworth (233 Fed., 191), Simon v. Southern Railway (236 U. S., 115), Ex parte Young (209 U. S., 123). For the citation of many of these we are indebted to the careful and painstaking study of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD], chairman of the Judiciary Committee, whose argument in this debate absolutely disposed of every claim made by the opponents of this bill, and established its constitutionality as far as anything could be established prior to the time that such a bill shall go to the Supreme Court and be finally passed on by that great tribunal. His presentation of the law did not leave its opponents a leg to stand on, and those who care to inquire further into its constitutionality will have to wait until the Supreme Court takes it up.

Among the list presented by the gentleman from Kansas was a case the opponents had not cited which, in my judgment, was perhaps the strongest in our favor, Ex parte Siebold (100 U. S., 387), in which, among other things, Justice Bradley said:

We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle that the Government of the United States may by means of physical force, exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it. This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws, and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] reproduces the above from the Siebold case as one of the citations in the Debs case, and it is the principal feature of the Debs case as applied to this discussion, though he overlooked the fact that it was the Siebold case and had been quoted the week before by the gentleman from Kansas. The gentleman from Ohio disposes of the idea that "it might be said that this decision was based upon interstate commerce powers of Congress," but it was unnecessary that he should go to that trouble, because the decision was made long before the interstate commerce act was. The gentleman from Nebraska has said that the Siebold case "repudiates everything [laughter]" the gentleman from Kansas claimed for it, and I think it proper that the major features of it should be presented in the RECORD so that they may be easily accessible to those who are interested for or against this proposed legislation and who can decide whether "it repudiates [laughter]" our claim for the bill.

EX PARTE SIEBOLD.

(100 U. S., 387 to 399.)

It is objected that Congress has no power to enforce State laws or to punish State officers, and especially has no power to punish them for violating the laws of their own State. As a general proposition, this is undoubtedly true; but when in the performance of their functions State officers are called upon to fulfill duties which they owe to the United States as well as to the State, has the former no means of compelling such fulfillment? Yet that is the case here. It is the duty of the States to elect Representatives to Congress. The due and fair election of these Representatives is of vital importance to the United States. The Government of the United States is no less concerned in the transaction than the State government is. It certainly is not bound to stand by as a passive spectator when duties are violated and outrageous frauds are committed. It is directly interested in the faithful performance by the officers of election of their respective duties. Those duties are owed as well to the United States as to the State. This necessarily follows from the mixed character of the transaction—State and National. A violation of duty is an offense against the United States, for which the offender is justly amenable to that Government. No official position can shelter him from this responsibility. * * *

The objection that the laws and regulations, the violation of which is made punishable by the acts of Congress, are State laws and have not been adopted by Congress, is no sufficient answer to the power of Congress to impose punishment. It is true that Congress has not deemed it necessary to interfere with the duties of the ordinary officers of election, but has been content to leave them as prescribed by State laws. It has only created additional sanctions for their performance and provided means of supervision in order more effectually to secure such performance. The imposition of punishment implies a prohibition of the act punished. The State laws which Congress sees no occasion to alter but which it allows to stand are, in effect, adopted by Congress. It simply demands their fulfillment. Content to leave the laws as they are, it is not content with the means provided for their enforcement. It provides additional means for that purpose; and we think it is entirely within its constitutional power to do so. * * *

Another objection made is that if Congress can impose penalties for violation of State laws, the officer will be made liable to double punishment for delinquency—at the suit of the State and at the suit of the United States. But the answer to this is that each government punishes for violation of duty to itself only. Where a person owes a duty to two sovereigns he is amenable to both for its performance and either may call him to account. Whether punishment inflicted by one can be pleaded in bar to a charge by the other for the same identical act need not now be decided, although considerable discussion bearing upon the subject has taken place in this court, tending to the conclusion that such a plea can not be sustained. In reference to a conviction under a State law for passing counterfeit coin, which was sought to be reversed on the ground that Congress had jurisdiction over that subject and might inflict punishment for the same offense, Mr. Justice Daniel, speaking for the court, said: "It is almost certain that in the benignant spirit in which the institutions both of the State and Federal systems are administered an offender who should have suffered the penalties denounced by the one would not be subjected a second time to punishment by the other for acts essentially the same unless, indeed, this might occur in instances of peculiar enormity or where the public safety demanded extraordinary rigor. But were a contrary course of policy or action either probable or usual this would by no means justify the conclusion that offenses falling within the competency of different authorities to restrain or punish them would not properly be subjected to the consequences which those authorities might ordain and affix to their perpetration." (Fox v. The State of Ohio, 5 How., 410.) * * * Substantially the same views are expressed in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542), referring to these cases, and we do not well see how the doctrine they contain can be controverted. * * * We have thus gone over the principal reasons of a special character relied on by the petitioners for maintaining the general proposition for which they contend. * * *

The more general reason assigned, to wit, that the nature of sovereignty is such as to preclude the joint cooperation of two sovereigns, even in a matter in which they are mutually concerned, is not, in our judgment, of sufficient force to prevent concurrent and harmonious action on the part of the National and State Governments in the election of Representatives. It is at most an argument ab inconveniente. There is nothing in the Constitution to forbid such cooperation in this case. * * *

As a general rule it is no doubt expedient and wise that the operations of the State and National Governments should, as far as practicable, be conducted separately, in order to avoid undue jealousies and jars and conflicts of jurisdiction and power. But there is no reason for laying this down as a rule of universal application. It should never be made to override the plain and manifest dictates of the Constitution itself. We can not yield to such a transcendental view of State sovereignty. The Constitution and laws of the United States are the supreme law of the land, and to these every citizen of every State owes obedience, whether in his individual or official capacity. There are very few subjects, it is true, in which our system of government, complicated as it is, requires or gives room for conjoint action between the State and National sovereignties. Generally the powers given by the Constitution to the Government of the United States are given over distinct branches of sovereignty from which the State governments, either expressly or by necessary implication, are excluded. But in this case expressly, and in some others by implication, as we have seen in the case of pilotage, a concurrent jurisdiction is contemplated, that of the State, however, being subordinate to that of the United States, whereby all question of precedency is eliminated. * * *

The views we have expressed seem to us to be founded on such plain and practical principles as hardly to need any labored argument in their support. We may mystify anything. But if we take a plain view of the words of the Constitution and give to them a fair and obvious interpretation we can not fail in most cases of coming to a clear understanding of its meaning. We shall not have far to seek. We shall find it on the surface and not in the profound depths of speculation.

The greatest difficulty in coming to a just conclusion arises from mistaken notions with regard to the relations which subsist between the State and National Governments. It seems to be often overlooked that a National Constitution has been adopted in this country establishing a real Government therein, operating upon persons and territory and things, and which, moreover, is, or should be, as dear to every American citizen as his State government is. Whenever the true conception of the nature of this Government is once conceded no real difficulty will arise in the just interpretation of its powers. But if we allow ourselves to regard it as a hostile organization, opposed to the proper sovereignty and dignity of the State governments, we shall continue to be vexed with difficulties as to its jurisdiction and authority. No greater jealousy is required to be exercised toward this Government in reference to the preservation of our liberties than is proper to be exercised toward the State governments. * * *

Somewhat akin to the argument which has been considered is the objection that the deputy marshals authorized by the act of Congress to be created and to attend the elections are authorized to keep the peace, and that this is a duty which belongs to the State authorities alone. It is argued that the preservation of peace and good order in society is not within the powers confided to the Government of the United States, but belongs exclusively to the States. Here again we are met with the theory that the Government of the United States does not rest upon the soil and territory of the country. We think that this theory is founded on an entire misconception of the nature and powers of the Government. We hold it to be an incontrovertible principle that the Government of the United States may, by means of physical force, exercised through its official agents, execute on every foot of American soil the powers and functions that belong to it. This necessarily involves the power to command obedience to its laws, and hence the power to keep the peace to that extent.

This power to enforce its laws and to execute its functions in all places does not derogate from the power of the State to execute its laws at the same time and in the same places. The one does not exclude the other, except where both can not be executed at the same time. In that case the words of the Constitution itself show which is to yield. "This Constitution, and all laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land."

This concurrent jurisdiction which the National Government necessarily possesses to exercise its powers of sovereignty in all parts of the United States is distinct from that exclusive power, which, by the first article of the Constitution, it is authorized to exercise over the District of Columbia, and over those places within a State which are purchased by consent of the legislature thereof, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards, and other needful buildings. There its jurisdiction is absolutely exclusive of that of the State unless, as is sometimes stipulated, power is given to the latter to serve the ordinary process of its courts in the precinct acquired.

Without the concurrent sovereignty referred to the National Government would be nothing but an advisory government. Its executive power would be absolutely nullified.

Why do we have marshals at all if they can not physically lay their hands on persons and things in the performance of their proper duties? What function can they perform if they can not use force? In executing the processes of the courts must they call on the nearest constable for protection? Must they rely on him to use the requisite compulsion and to keep the peace whilst they are soliciting and entreating the parties and bystanders to allow the law to take its course? This is the necessary consequence of the positions that are assumed. If we indulge in such impracticable views as these and keep on refining and re-refining, we shall drive the National Government out of the United States and relegate it to the District of Columbia or, perhaps, to some foreign soil. We shall bring it back to a condition of greater helplessness than that of the old confederation.

The argument is based on a strained and impracticable view of the nature and powers of the National Government. It must execute its powers or it is no Government. It must execute them on the land as well as on the sea, on things as well as on persons. And to do this it must necessarily have power to command obedience, preserve order, and keep the peace. * * *

The next point raised is that the act of Congress proposes to operate on officers or persons authorized by State laws to perform certain duties under them and to require them to disobey and disregard State laws when they come in conflict with the act of Congress; that it thereby of necessity produces collision, and is therefore void. This point has been already fully considered. We have shown, as we think, that where the regulations of Congress conflict with those of the State it is the latter which are void and not the regulations of Congress, and that the laws of the State, in so far as they are inconsistent with the laws of Congress on the same subject, cease to have effect as laws. * * *

The doctrine laid down at the close of counsel's brief, that the State and National Governments are coordinate and altogether equal, on which their whole argument, indeed, is based, is only partially true.

The true doctrine, as we conceive, is that, that whilst the States are really sovereign as to all matters which have not been granted to the jurisdiction and control of the United States, the Constitution and constitutional laws of the latter are, as we have already said, the supreme law of the land; and when they conflict with the laws of the States they are of paramount authority and obligation. This is the fundamental principle on which the authority of the Constitution is based; and unless it be conceded in practice as well as theory the fabric of our institutions, as it was contemplated by its founders, can not stand. The questions involved have respect not more to the autonomy and existence of the States than to the continued existence of the United States as a Government to which every American citizen may look for security and protection in every part of the land. * * *

TENNESSEE v. DAVIS.

In this case the court said:

The General Government must cease to exist whenever it can not enforce the exercise of its constitutional powers within the States by the instrumentality of its officers and agents.

The gentleman from Kansas merely cited this as preliminary to further argument. The gentleman from Nebraska says that it "absolutely repudiates [laughter]" the constitutionality of this law and the claim of the gentleman from Kansas that any of these decisions support the bill. The gentleman from Kansas did not say whether it did or not. It decides that the Government can not exist unless it can carry out its laws, and any suggestion that that "absolutely repudiates [laughter]" sheds some light on the value of the gentleman's legal deductions.

UNITED STATES v. CRUIKSHANK.

(92 U. S., 555.)

The orators against the antilynching bill claim that United States against Cruikshank is a case that holds this bill unconstitutional. The gentleman from Kansas, on January 10, devoted 14 lines to this decision and no more! They follow:

The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.

The gentleman from Nebraska adds 50 per cent to the quotation from the Cruikshank case, the decision in which was written by Chief Justice Waite, ascribes it to Chief Justice Brewer, and says in his speech on the floor—and under the wording of that opinion the gentleman cited it with approval as showing that section 4 predicated upon no action of the State is within the fourteenth amendment. [Applause.]

In the same speech in the RECORD for his above statement he substitutes the following:

This is the opinion cited by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] in support of section 4, which section is predicated exclusively on individual action and utterly ignores any action on the part of the State. [Applause.]

In his speech on the floor he said:

Was within the fourteenth amendment. [Applause.]

In his speech in the RECORD he says:

And utterly ignores any action on the part of the State. [Applause.]

It has been a source of great anxiety to me that in substituting one set of words for another he might have overlooked the laughter and applause, but I am glad to say he never does.

In his speech of January 10 the gentleman from Kansas made no reference whatever to the Cruikshank case, directly or indirectly, except as I have just above cited in full. The gentleman from Nebraska deliberately says that the words above quoted from the Cruikshank case and 50 per cent more, which he selected to suit himself and which never appeared in Mr. LITTLE's speech at any place, were advanced by the gentleman with the claim that they sustained the constitutionality of the law.

CRUIKSHANK v. JAMES AND BOWMAN.

The gentleman from Nebraska in his speech on the floor said that the quotation from the Cruikshank case was written by Judge Brewer in James against Bowman, where it was cited by Judge Brewer. In his revision of his speech in the RECORD he quotes Mr. LITTLE's citation from Cruikshank and 50 per cent more of it, says it is from James against Bowman, and is by Judge Brewer, but adds one line, saying of this citation:

To the same effect is United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542).

He evidently had been told by somebody in the meantime that his statement was not correct, and made this little effort to hedge. But the effect that he made on the floor still lingers with those who heard it, because he has not corrected his misunderstanding.

EX PARTE VIRGINIA.

This is one of the cases cited by the gentleman from Kansas, which we are told, "every one of which absolutely repudiated everything that he said. [Laughter.]" Let us see about it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], who so ably led a fight which had no encouraging features, said that this case—Ex parte Virginia—was one of the two "upon which proponents largely rely for support" of this bill, and particularly section 3 of it. As that astute gentleman conceded at the beginning of the debate that this decision will be used against him, it is highly probable that there must be something in it that tends to support the theory that the bill is constitutional, and therefore the claim of the eloquent lawyer from Nebraska that it "entirely repudiates the claim of constitutionality [laughter]" could hardly be a correct view. This case in effect decides that the sheriff, for example, acts for the State, "and as he acts in the name of and for the State, and is clothed with her power, his act is her act." Thus it holds that when the sheriff refuses to give equal protection to a man, that is the refusal of the State, and the laws of Congress then take charge of the situation, and the whole matter goes into the Federal courts. It thus defines definitely what is a refusal by the State.

The only decision cited by the bill's opponents which even tends to support their claim is that of Kentucky v. Dennison (65 U. S., 66), where Chief Justice Taney held that Congress could not control the State officer at all. This Ex parte Virginia decision holds that that was the law before the fourteenth amendment, but is not the law any longer on any point that arises under the fourteenth amendment, and disposes of the only case which holds against us directly. Disposing of Kentucky against Dennison and definitely fixing just when a State has refused to do its duty, this case is of tremendous importance in this debate and practically determines of itself the constitutionality of the proposed legislation. It goes further into detail and is of such importance that I lay before the House various citations from the decision itself that you can judge for yourself its results and effects.

EX PARTE VIRGINIA.

One great purpose of these amendments was to raise the colored race from that condition of inferiority and servitude in which most of them had previously stood into perfect equality of civil rights with all other persons within the jurisdiction of the States. They were intended to take away all possibility of oppression by law because of race or color. They were intended to be what they really are, limitations of the power of the States and enlargements of the power of Congress. They are to some extent declaratory of rights, and though in form prohibitions they imply immunities such as may be protected by congressional legislation. We had occasion in the Slaughterhouse cases (16 Wall., 27) to express our opinion of their spirit and purpose and to some extent of their meaning. We have been called to consider them in Tennessee v. Davis (supra, p. 257) and Strauder v. West Virginia (supra, p. 303). In this latter case we held that the fourteenth amendment secures, among other civil rights, to colored men, when charged with criminal offenses against a State, an impartial jury trial by jurors indifferently selected or chosen without discrimination against such jurors because of their color. We held that immunity from any such discrimination is one of the equal rights of all persons, and that any withholding it by a State is a denial of the equal protection of the laws within the meaning of the amendment. We held that such an equal right is an impartial jury trial, and such an immunity from unfriendly discrimination are placed by the amendment under the protection of the General Government and guaranteed by it. We held, further, that this protection and this guaranty, as the fifth section of the amendment expressly ordains, may be enforced by Congress by means of appropriate legislation.

All the amendments derive much of their force from this latter provision. It is not said the judicial power of the General Government shall extend to enforcing the prohibitions and to protecting the rights and immunities guaranteed. It is not said that branch of the Government shall be authorized to declare void any action of a State in violation of the prohibitions. It is the power of Congress which has been enlarged. Congress is authorized to enforce the prohibitions by appropriate legislation. Some legislation is contemplated to make the amendments fully effective. Whatever legislation is appropriate—that is, adapted to carry out the objects the amendments have in view—whatever tends to enforce submission to the prohibitions they contain, and to secure to all persons the enjoyment of perfect equality of civil rights and the equal protection of the laws against State denial or invasion, if not prohibited, is brought within the domain of congressional power.

Nor does it make any difference that such legislation is restrictive of what the State might have done before the constitutional amendment was adopted. The prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are directed to the States, and they are to a degree restrictions of State power. It is these which Congress is empowered to enforce, and to enforce against State action, however put forth, whether that action be executive, legislative, or judicial. Such enforcement is no invasion of State sovereignty. No law can be which the people of the States have, by the Constitution of the United States, empowered Congress to enact. This extent of the powers of the General Government is overlooked when it is said, as it has been in this case, that the act of March 1, 1875, interferes with State rights. It is said the selection of jurors for her courts and the administration of her laws belong to each State; that they are her rights. This is true in general. But in exercising her rights a State can not disregard the limitations which the Federal Constitution has applied to her power. Her rights do not reach to that extent. Nor can she deny to the General Government the right to exercise all its granted powers, though they may interfere with the full enjoyment of rights she would have if those powers had not been thus granted. Indeed, every addition of power to the General Government involves a corresponding diminution of the governmental powers of the States. It is carved out of them.

We have said the prohibitions of the fourteenth amendment are addressed to the States. They are, "No State shall make or enforce a law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, * * * nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." They have reference to actions of the political body denominated a State, by whatever instruments or in whatever modes that action may be taken. A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State and is clothed with the State's power his act is that of the State. This must be so, or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.

But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons, and, to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights, power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State but upon the persons who are the agents of the State, in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured. Such is the act of March 1 1876, and we think it was fully authorized by the Constitution.

The argument in support of the petition for a habeas corpus ignores entirely the power conferred upon Congress by the fourteenth amendment. Were it not for the fifth section of that amendment there might be room for argument that the first section is only declaratory of the moral duty of the State, as was said in Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Dennison (24 How., 66). The act under consideration in that case provided no means to compel the execution of the duty required by it and the Constitution gave none. It was of such an act Mr. Chief Justice Taney said that a power vested in the United States to inflict any punishment for neglect or refusal to perform the duty required by the act of Congress "would place every State under the control and dominion of the General Government, even in the administration of its internal concerns and reserved rights." But the Constitution now expressly gives authority for congressional interference and compulsion in the cases embraced within the fourteenth amendment. It is but a limited authority, true, extending only to a single class of cases; but within its limits it is complete. The remarks made in Kentucky v. Dennison and in Collector v. Day, though entirely just as applied to the cases in which they were made, are inapplicable to the case we have now in hand. * * *

Upon the whole, as we are of opinion that the act of Congress upon which the indictment against the petitioner was founded is constitutional and that he is correctly held to answer it, and as, therefore, no object would be secured by issuing a writ of habeas corpus, the petitions are denied.

WHEN DOES STATE ACT?

I hope for careful study of Ex parte Virginia by all lawyers who are interested in this bill.

There has been throughout the discussion an occasional difference as to just how the State denies that constitutional right to equal protection. This bill is all founded on the preliminary statement that it applies locally whenever the sheriff refuses a man protection and under similar situations. In the case of Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 347) the Supreme Court said:

A State acts by its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities. It can act in no other way. The constitutional provision, therefore, must mean that no agency of the State, or of the officers or agents by whom its powers are exerted, shall deny to any persons within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws. Whoever, by virtue of public position under a State government, deprives another of property, life, or liberty without due process of law, or denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws, violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State, and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning. Then the State has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or to evade it.

But the constitutional amendment was ordained for a purpose. It was to secure equal rights to all persons, and to insure to all persons the enjoyment of such rights power was given to Congress to enforce its provisions by appropriate legislation. Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State, but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured.

This decision is peculiarly objectionable to friends of the reserve power to avoid jury trials. Naturally there has been a very determined effort to reverse and dispose of this decision, and several different methods have been adopted. The trouble the opponents of the bill have is that everybody in the House can read, and the Supreme Court decision is in the English language, which we all understand perfectly. For that reason the various learned dissertations on the subject have no effect, and run away from the debate like water runs off a duck's back. Other desperate gentlemen have resorted to other interesting and bolder methods. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] takes the plain and simple stand that none of the cases which have been cited by the advocates of the bill have anything to do with the bill or the question at issue. This would end the discussion if he were right. Early in the debate I said that we had heard some pretty good oratory and some pretty bad law. The speech of the gentleman from Nebraska was the best illustration of this that was made during the debate.

TAMMANY HALL V. SUPREME COURT.

A more vigorous and more definite presentation of the argument against the above-cited Virginia case was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN]. When the gentleman from Kansas directed the attention of the gentleman from Virginia, Gov. MONTAGUE, to the quotation above the gentleman from New York saw at a glance that if that decision was to go unchallenged the cause was lost, so he promptly arose with a wave of his hand and gravely announced that the Supreme Court never made the decision the gentleman was reading. What puzzles me is why did not he deny that there is any such thing as the Supreme Court, and thus dispose of all the cases they found so embarrassing. His system of just simply pointedly denying the existence of the decision is the very best argument they make. The gentleman from Nebraska would have added greatly to the force of his argument if he had adopted that policy instead of a mere quibble as to whether they applied and just simply said there were not any such cases. It would have been just as accurate and would have been more definite and positive, and would have disposed of it entirely without further argument—if true.

The gentleman from Kansas regrets very much that he has precipitated a question of veracity as between the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] and Justice Strong, of the Supreme Court of the United States. The gentleman from Kansas found a book, said to be the One hundredth United States Report, and located there what was said to be a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States delivered by Mr. Justice Strong. Confiding in the veracity of Justice Strong and believing in the authenticity of the volume, he read from it, as he has done many times in the last 35 years, what the gentleman from Kansas supposed was a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] promptly rose to his feet and announced that the Supreme Court said nothing of the kind. Of course, I relied entirely upon Mr. Justice Strong, and it is simply a question between him and the distinguished attorney from the lair of the Tiger in Tammany Hall. During the admirable speech by the gentleman from Virginia, Gov. MONTAGUE, I read from that decision, as I said a moment ago. If you will refer to page 347 of volume 100 in any copy of the United States Reports you can find, you can decide from it whether the statement of the gentleman from New York is correct. Some of you might think that one of us was lying, and if so I want it definitely understood who was.

During the speech of the gentleman from Virginia the gentleman from Kansas read from Ex parte Virginia, One hundredth United States, 347, part of that which I quoted a moment ago. The record of the speech of the gentleman from Virginia then shows:

Mr. COCKRAN. Oh, the Supreme Court has said nothing of the kind.

Mr. LITTLE. It did. I am reading from it. This is from page 347 of Ex parte Virginia. I am quoting from the Supreme Court, and it contradicts the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COCKRAN. When a State officer is violating the law of a State he is acting against the State and can not be acting for it.

Mr. LITTLE. The Supreme Court has held otherwise. I can only read it to you. I can not make you understand it.

Mr. COCKRAN. No; you can not.

For the stenographer's notes on that last sentence has been substituted a slight change in the RECORD, of no importance. The question still remains as to whether the gentleman from New York can be made to understand the case. I would suggest that he read it carefully, and he was so perfectly clear as to what it meant that I am sure when he reads it nothing further will be necessary.

The fact is that the keen mind of the gentleman from New York recognized, when he heard this decision thus quoted, that if the court so held their cause was lost, that it settled the matter, and with a Napoleonic grasp of the situation he promptly saw that the only safety was to deny that it had ever been made, and in this case he was strategically right. If it had not been for the record in the future, he could have gotten away with that. While the bold and vigorous course of denying the Ex parte Virginia decision is the best argument they could make, unfortunately it will not stand fire any better than the others, because the mere reading of the case shows that Justice Strong is right and the Tiger orator was wrong.

In the aforesaid Ex parte Virginia, page 347, the Supreme Court says that a State can only act by its legislative, executive, and judicial authority, that the constitutional provision therefore must mean that no agency of the State shall deny to any person the equal protection of its laws, and it states—whoever by virtue of public position under State government * * * denies or takes away the equal protection of the laws violates the constitutional inhibition; and as he acts in the name and for the State and is clothed with the State's power his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning.

In other words, the Supreme Court says that when a sheriff denies equal protection of the laws, his act is that of the State. That is the decision of the Supreme Court and is the law of the land. When a mob hurries a man to a lynching and the sheriff refuses to assist him, as the Supreme Court says—his act is that of the State. This must be so or the constitutional prohibition has no meaning.

The gentleman from Virginia, Gov. MONTAGUE, tells us that when the sheriff refuses to aid the victim, the sheriff is violating the law of the State, and therefore his act is not that of the State at all. Which is right, the governor or the Supreme Court? Great as is my respect for that distinguished gentleman of the old school from Virginia, I am compelled to yield to the decision of the Supreme Court and the Constitution of the Union, and so are you, whether you wish to or not.

He and the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] urged the elementary legal proposition that a city or county or State can not be held responsible for the legal acts of their officers ordinarily. The sovereign can not be held responsible for anything except by the sovereign's own authority. At any time a State wishes to make itself or its municipal corporations liable for a sheriff's illegal acts it could do so. If this bill is passed, the United States will do so. In half the States of the Union the State has decided to do so, and you can sue either city or county for the damage done by the mobs when the peace officer does not enforce the law.

Every few months the State Militia turns out to support the sheriff, and every few years the Army of the Republic appears to assist the sheriff in keeping the peace. Every time they wish, the governor can ask for the aid of the Federal Government to enforce the laws of the State. But now when under the fourteenth amendment the State arranges to assist them in enforcing their laws and keeping the peace, they exclaim in alarm, the Nation is about to do just what we asked them to do last year, and as one astute gentleman from Maine puts it, "are about to take away the last vestige of human rights" by compelling our people to desist from burning each other.

If the refusal of the sheriff to enforce the law of the State is not the refusal of the State, whose act would be the refusal of the State? These distinguished gentlemen can not argue the seal off the bond with sophistical rhetoric and abstruse disquisition. As the Supreme Court says in Ex parte Virginia, unless the Constitution means that, it does not mean anything. The gentleman introduces a bit of elementary law on legal situations not covered by statute yet to offset a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. Would he say that to the Supreme Court? Certainly not.

Every once in a while, somebody gets up on this floor and says, Would such a law apply to burglary and horse stealing? Why does he ask? He can read the Constitution. The Constitution says that—

No State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

What does it mean? Why, it means what it says. If they burglarize A's house and refuse him the protection of the law, then Congress can see that he gets the same protection that B does for his house.

This bill provides that if a mob carries on a performance, the Federal Government interferes. There was no need for that. Whenever a man, one man, is refused the equal protection of the laws, the Constitution authorizes Congress to interfere.

Men say that we must show that there is wide-spread lynching. In this mighty Republic, the humblest of its citizens is just as much entitled to the equal protection of the laws as any million of men could be. Why do people ask such questions? Have we ceased to be able to read the Constitution, and if we have, we certainly can read Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S.). If when a sheriff refuses to do his duty it would not be the act of the State, what would be?

If the National Government can not punish the officer for violating the constitutional provision that he shall not deny to any person the equal protection of the laws, what possible reason could there be for making such a constitutional amendment? God's love! Is the Constitution, then, a jest, a little sly joke on those who writhe at the stake while a drunken mob dances in glee about them, perhaps about your son! The Constitution of the United States is the grandest thunderbolt that God Almighty ever launched to protect all men and all their rights, to establish and secure liberty and equality in the name of the law to all who dwell under its mighty flag.

And yet, if the gentlemen from Virginia and New York are correct in their views of the decisions of our Supreme Court, all that is necessary for a lawless sheriff to do to escape punishment for his crimes is to wave his hand and scornfully say, "Take away that tin whistle; that is no thunderbolt. Yes; I helped the mob hang the American citizen without a trial, and I spit upon your Constitution. What are you going to do about it?"

The gentleman from Virginia does not make any quotation from any Supreme Court decision which he claims supports his theory. He thus shrewdly avoids the pitfall into which so many of his colleagues fall, of having their arguments destroyed by the fact that not one single solitary one of the decisions alleged to support their theories was able to stand fire for a moment. The gentleman very wisely depends upon his own admirable capacity for philosophical argument to sustain his position. Yet through his entire speech he never advances any reason why he thinks that a sheriff who disobeys the laws of his State, and by doing so violates the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution and this law, if such it becomes, should not be punished in the Federal courts. In his entire speech he never suggested any possible method by which the fourteenth amendment could be enforced, unless he arrests the State officer who is guilty. What would he do? If this bill does not present a solution of the difficulty, what would it be? Of course, there is no other. And all through this debate nobody has ventured to suggest any other possible plan.

But the gentleman continues:

I take it that no lawyer in this body, removed from partisan prejudice, which is sometimes unknown to its possessor, will contend that the bill is constitutional as respects any of its provisions, save the one in relation to sheriffs or ministerial officers. Surely no one can contend successfully that this bill is valid in its application to the acts of individuals or counties.

Why not? Where is any decision that the counties could not be sued? For weeks this debate has slowly progressed, and as far as I have been able to discover, not the most enthusiastic of the advocates of the constitutional right to burn their fellow citizens alive has even pretended to produce a decision that a county could not be sued for the damages done by its officers under a law like this, and yet men coolly assume that counties could not be sued, when they are suing them every day in half the States of the Union under similar conditions. They have no decision to sustain this cool assumption of superior knowledge of the law and, of course, if there were one such decision it would have been in this RECORD weeks ago. It is just as easy to say, "I take it for granted that no lawyer will contend that the bill is unconstitutional with regard to the counties and the private citizens," as it was for the gentleman to say to the contrary. That is pure assumption, and no argument, and there has been no argument made here, sustained by any even pretense of a decision, that the counties could not be sued.

A man and his wife are both entitled to the protection of the State laws under the guaranty in the Federal Constitution. When the man and the wife have both been denied that protection at home and he has been hanged, and the State gives her no protection, where will she get the benefit of the guaranty of the National Government? Do you propose to deny her any recourse? If so, what value has your Constitution? Of course, the woman is entitled to the benefit of that constitutional guaranty. Of course, she can only get it by a right to bring suit against somebody, and if not against the county, where will her demand be lodged? Why, the proposition is so elementary that it is astounding any lawyer will advance it, and nobody has pretended to offer or submit any suggestion of different relief and enforcement of the guaranty for her.

CAN SUE COUNTIES.

Nobody has even suggested any decision that the United States can not institute this suit against a county. This part of the bill is based upon the South Carolina law, very similar to the laws of many States, where counties are sued every day for such damages by a mob. The founding of this bill upon a mob allegation puts it in accord with all the State laws on the subject. Men seemed entirely to have overlooked the fact that the United States can sue a State any time, as is shown by U. S. vs. North Carolina, 136 U. S., 211; U. S. vs. Texas, 143 U. S., 621; U. S. vs. Michigan, 190 U. S., 379; Lincoln County vs. Luning, 133 U. S., 529. In the North Carolina case the United States sued North Carolina on some North Carolina bonds it owned. If it had owned some county bonds it could have sued the county, and it can maintain a suit against a county on any cause of action it has or establishes by law. The Supreme Court of the United States has plainly said that Congress can "do whatever is necessary," in its "discretion," to enforce the fourteenth amendment to give citizens equal protection. How could equal protection be given if such a suit can not be maintained?

Gentlemen loudly declare themselves against the possibility that some dying man might be surreptitiously dragged across the corner of an uninformed county in the night, but they do not say what they would do if the victim is taken in broad daylight with everybody's knowledge, 30 miles across an entire county; and that is the way they have been handling those cases. The counties under the ordinary rules of law are liable jointly or severally, according to the facts. If public sentiment of the counties permit their sheriffs to violate these laws, they should be liable under all the rules of equity and justice and common sense. The only defense pretended here is a technical one, and they dare not name one single decision to sustain that theory. They speak with the calm certainty of being right about a technical legal proposition, without suggesting that there ever was a decision to sustain them. This method of debate is just a mere bluff. Let us see your cases, gentlemen.

THE ACTS OF INDIVIDUALS.

And as to the acts of individuals? Here, they tell us, our proud waves must be stayed. Some of them concede that something can be done with the sheriff, a favorite attitude of those gentlemen who belong to the dignified band of "grave doubters," "conservative men." They suggest that while, of course, the sheriff is liable, that is as far as Congress could go. Why is it? Where is any decision that when complaint is made of a State and its conduct by its officers the individual can not be punished? The level-headed attorney from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] spent considerable time in presenting the Riggans, Powell, and Hodges cases. In the Powell case, which he argued, Alabama turned out a company of militia to protect the man. They would not be liable under this law, if this bill becomes a law, because the State has done its duty. Indeed, the gentleman actually read to the House that part of the decision which said "there is no complaint made of the State." Under the actions brought under this bill, the first charge will be a complaint of the State, and yet the gentleman seemed to think that a decision in a case in which no charge was made that the State had refused protection was a decision that a law which based its entire field of operations on first proving that the State, through its officers, had denied equal protection would be unconstitutional. What is the idea, anyway? What has the one to do with the other?

UNITED STATES MARSHAL, SHERIFF, MOB, AND VICTIM.

But let us see what the situation would be if it were a fact that after the United States marshal has arrested the sheriff for denying a man protection, he could not arrest the mob. Let us supppose that this law is enacted; that a mob of five or more is on the road to their favorite tree to hang a man without a trial and over his objections, and he spies the sheriff and calls for help, and the sheriff refuses it. To be frank about it, gentlemen, I take it that no lawyer will seriously say that the marshal can not then and there arrest the sheriff and take him into the Federal court. But what becomes of the victim?

Is it possible that there is an intelligent man in the world who will say that the marshal can not rescue that prisoner, put that mob under arrest, and take them into the Federal court, which, by the arrest of the sheriff, secured jurisdiction of the entire subject? If there is somebody that claims that, what is it that he says in effect?

He says in a dignified way to the victim, "It is true that the Constitution guarantees you the equal protection of the law, and that the sheriff refuses to give it to you, but when the Constitution says 'equal protection' for you it doesn't mean to give you equal protection against the mob, but against the sheriff only. The marshal, of course, sees you there and knows you will soon be dead, but the great Government of the United States is wholly unable to enforce the fourteenth amendment. If you will get the mob to wait until the marshal has placed the sheriff in jail and called the attention of the governor to the situation or presented a request to the Supreme Court for a writ of habeas corpus, directing the mob to bring you into their court, perhaps something can be done."

The decisions say that, the occasion having arisen and protection having been denied, Congress can do "whatever is necessary," in its "discretion," to give the man the equal protection of the law of his State. Is there anybody really going to say, is anybody actually going to tell us that a man hanged by a mob in spite of the arrest of the sheriff by the United States marshal, is getting any protection at all? Why, if the marshal could not under all those circumstances arrest that mob, your Constitution and the decisions of your Supreme Court are "mere scraps of paper," with less binding force than the city ordinances of Timbuktu.

Congress has full power to make such legislation when the State will not protect, and unless there is lodged somewhere in the Federal Government the power to rescue the prisoner and punish the mob the fourteenth amendment is as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean.

As the Supreme Court says in the Siebold case:

> The objection that the laws, the violation of which is made punishable by act of Congress, are State laws and have not been adopted by Congress is no sufficient answer to the power of Congress to impose punishment. The State laws which Congress sees no occasion to alter, but which it allows to stand, are in effect adopted by Congress. It simply demands their fulfillment. Content to leave the laws as they are, it is not content with the means provided for their enforcement. It provides additional means for that purpose, and we think is entirely within its constitutional powers to do so.

As the Supreme Court said in the Civil Rights cases:

> Until some State law has been passed or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken adverse to the right of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment, nor any proceeding under such legislation, can be called into activity. * * * Of course, legislation can and should be provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises.

SHOULD "LEGISLATE IN ADVANCE."

Because the Supreme Court has so decided, the committee has presented this bill in order to follow the directions of the Supreme Court, which says that "legislation can and should be provided in advance" and "can be called into activity" "to meet the exigency when it arises." The Supreme Court has simply directed Congress to prepare legislation in advance to meet such an exigency and to be called into activity when the exigency arises and to arrest the sheriff and to arrest the mob and to succor the prisoner whenever the exigency arises. If the Constitution meant anything else than legislation such as this bill you know that a dozen eager voices would have told on this floor what they thought it meant; but they are as silent as the tomb of the man the mob burns.

But, gentlemen, those graves are never silent, but send up every year their cry of distress against the death of unarmed, defenseless, and untried men by gangs of murderers acting in violation of the laws of the State and Constitution of the Union, and taking into their hands the powers of the courts, whose learned and honorable judges have shed luster and distinction on the enforcement of the laws of every Commonwealth and of this great Union itself. The argument for them is the argument for the defendant in Civilization vs. Barbarism.

WHEN DOES THE SHERIFF FAIL TO DO HIS DUTY?

The gentleman from South Carolina [Capt. MCSWAIN] has probably given the law of this question as much examination as has been given it by any Member of his side of the House. That gentleman has done the gentleman from Kansas the honor to ask him two questions. He says, "Who prescribes the duty of the sheriff?" Why, the laws of the State do, of course. He asks, "When does the sheriff fail to do his duty?" That is the question that the court and the jury will be called on to decide. You might just as well ask, "When does a man commit murder?" Neither you nor I can tell until the courts have passed on it, and that is the difficulty with the entire argument of the gentleman from South Carolina and all his colleagues. They have not yet learned that the laws give courts the authority to decide when murder is committed and that a mob decision is no evidence.

He suggests that the laws of the various States are somewhat different. What of it? The Constitution simply says that each man shall have with every other man the equal protection of the law of his State. The Federal courts are supposed to follow in each State the procedure of that State, and that is what they will do under this bill in this respect. Why does the gentleman ask the question?

JUSTICE MILLER.

The gentleman from South Carolina, Capt. MCSWAIN, presents a careful statement and analysis of decisions, which is a very valuable part of this debate, and it is a source of regret that he has not arrived at sounder conclusions. The opponents of the bill ought to be more specific and definite in their exact statement of what decisions support them in their judgment, and should point out more definitely the flaws that they think they find in our citations. In other words, their argument is scattering. The gentleman from South Carolina, I note with pleasure, speaks with great respect of Justice Miller and his decisions on these causes, but does not state definitely just what he has said that would be helpful to their views. When I was a young man at Leavenworth reading law the Federal courts met often in that city, and Justice Miller occasionally honored us with his appearance on the bench. I just remember one thing that he said on the trial bench. A gentleman was somewhat prolix, and perhaps somewhat wandering in his argument. Finally Justice Miller slapped his hand down on the bench and said, "Damn it, man, come to the point." I commend to the gentleman opposing this bill the learned justice's suggestion.

The gentleman from South Carolina tells us what he says the Ex parte Virginia case decides. If he will turn to Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S.), he will find that the Supreme Court said in that case, speaking of Federal laws:

Such legislation must act upon persons, not upon the abstract thing denominated a State, but upon the persons who are the agents of the State in the denial of the rights which were intended to be secured.

And it also says, speaking of the officer:

And as he acts in the name and for the State and is clothed with the State's power, his act is that of the State.

In his natural anxiety to ascertain just what the Ex parte Virginia case was about, the gentleman must not overlook the valuable information the Supreme Court conveys in the above sentences, which are the law.

The gentleman seems to think that the Civil Rights cases have done something to the Ex parte Virginia case. In the Civil Rights cases the United States Supreme Court said—as I noted a moment ago—and it was speaking of situations similar to this:

Until some State law has been passed or some State action through its officers or agents has been taken adverse to the rights of citizens sought to be protected by the fourteenth amendment, no legislation of the United States under said amendment nor any proceedings under such legislation can be called into activity for the prohibitions of the amendment or against State laws and acts done under State authority. Of course, legislation may and should be provided in advance to meet the exigency when it arises, but it should be adapted to the mischief and wrong which the amendment was intended to provide against, and that is State laws or State action of some kind adverse to the rights of citizens secured by the amendment.

I think it was very kind and considerate of the gentleman to again direct our attention to the law of that case just illustrated. The decision the gentleman presents to us just simply says in effect that under the fourteenth amendment we can make just such a law as this bill proposes. My understanding is that the gentleman himself is opposed to this legislation, and it is somewhat difficult to comprehend why he would challenge our attention to a decision which absolutely demonstrates that we are making this law exactly as the Supreme Court would want it made. This bill is based on the South Carolina law, and I hear it works very well. They seem to have no trouble in suing a county because its sheriff disobeys the law. Neither will Congress.

The Congress of the United States is not undertaking to make any laws to take the place of those in any State. The Congress of the United States is endeavoring to say to the officers of each State that they must enforce the laws of that State, and that if they do not, we will, and they will suffer first. All these decisions the gentlemen cite in support of their claim are simply cases in which nobody claimed that a State had done any wrong. What these gentlemen are trying to say is that the decision in Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 347) is no decision and that the State does not act by its sheriff, and that therefore the fourteenth amendment can not be operated and enforced. If there were any decisions that the State does not act by its officers, if there were any decisions that the sheriff's denial of protection is not the denial of the Commonwealth, if there were any decisions reversing Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S., 347), they would somewhere in the last month have strayed into this debate, but they were all dream decisions.

The gentleman from South Carolina urges that if the sheriff were not sheriff, he could still assist in a lynching. Yes; but what is the idea? He could not unless some sheriff refused to do his duty, and the new sheriff would be doing what he could not do if he were not sheriff, that is refusing to do his duty as sheriff.

The gentleman, who is evidently a close student of the law, says that in the Harris case (106 U. S., 639), individuals who took a prisoner from a sheriff and lynched him were held not to have violated any Federal right. But he neglects to add that the court said of the law under which Harris was indicted that "It applies, no matter how well the State may have performed its duty." This bill begins to act only when the State, by the sheriff or other agent, refuses to give a man protection. If the statute under which Harris was indicted had contained such a provision, it would have been constitutional. The gentleman, whose arguments are generally clear, should note that fact.

The Constitution means what it says, and Ex parte Virginia means what it says, and the Siebold case means what it says, and the law is not a joke in this Republic, and the Constitution is not a fake in this mighty Nation, and every man in every State is entitled to a protection equal to that given every other man in that State, and if God reigns, and the Government at Washington still lives, the Republic of Abraham Lincoln is about to see that every one of them, rich or poor, black or white, gets his constitutional rights.

The gentleman from South Carolina does not believe that Congress has power to have the sheriff arrested and punished, but let us hope that with his logical mind he does realize that as a matter of course, if Congress has a right to bring the sheriff into the Federal courts the United States marshal will bring with him every member of the murderous mob that slays a defenseless man without trial. The only question in this debate is whether under the fourteenth amendment the States reserved the power to punish men without trial.

The gentleman from Maine says that "since the days of Blaine and Grady, the sons of the Blue and the Gray have fought side by side." Yes, we have; I was there. Once, as I led the Twentieth Kansas by the First Tennessee I had our band play Dixie and heard the famous Yell go up as a token of brotherhood between Kansas and Tennessee. But we were not fighting for any reserve power to lynch people. Black men fought, too. "We have been trying to demonstrate how beautiful it is for nations to dwell together in unity," he says. How efficacious would that speech be at a lynching bee? And then the gentleman demands that we desist from disturbing harmony and arousing discord and dissension by calling attention to the violation of law by mobs when they soak men with oil and burn them alive without a trial, and when the sheriff refuses to move to give men the equal protection of the law of his State that is guaranteed them by the Constitution of the Union which we have sworn to uphold. Yes; I think there is a certain annoying and disturbing effect produced by focusing attention upon so unfortunate a situation, but I do not believe it is half as embarrassing as it would be for you to be burned alive yourself. Suppose that you just vote to sustain the Constitution and terminate this unfortunate discussion. You have taken an oath to do this. Are you going to carry out what you have sworn to do or not? [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, we come to the conclusion of the debate upon one of the most important questions which has challenged the attention of the American Congress during the last half century, and in some respects the most important. We, from the South, understand full well the position which we occupy. Deserted, in a measure, by the men of our own political faith in the North and in the East, undertaking to defend ourselves behind the clear provisions of the Constitution, challenging gentlemen of the majority to the observation of their official oaths, presenting to the Congress an unbroken line of decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States against the constitutionality of this bill, we face its adoption by this body. Not one gentleman do I recall, save, perhaps, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee [Mr. VOLSTEAD], has stood in his place where I stand and claimed that this bill in all its provisions is constitutional. I challenge the history of legislation in the American Congress for a parallel.

As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] has said, the race question has no place in this discussion. The philosophy of Government, the constitutionality of the bill, the wisdom of the governmental policy which it embodies, are independent of any considerations of race or of section, but we of the South have an additional concern. By reason of that which was done by our ancestors we are confronted there with the most difficult and the most dangerous domestic situation which ever was visited upon a people. We are trying an experiment that has never before succeeded, trying to have two races live side by side as neighbors in a great section of the country; people who are diametrically opposed to each other racially. Now, gentlemen, you have the power. We understand that. You have the votes and you have the responsibility. You can do as you will, but you must answer to the country; you must answer to your God, and you must answer to history for what you do this day. God being my witness I believe that with this policy which you are inaugurating you will turn loose the passions of race conflict in my country and dye my country red with blood.

I come to you upon my responsibility as a Member of the American Congress and upon whatever reputation for honesty I have, and I look you in the face and I tell you that I believe, and every man from the South tells you that he believes, that this proposed legislation will add to the peril of our women, will weaken the sense of local responsibility, and lessen the power of our law-abiding people to stop mob violence.

Yet in the face of the judgment of witnesses whom you can not impeach you propose to do that which the decisions of the Supreme Court and the plain language of the Constitution says violates your official oaths. I do not mean to be offensive, gentlemen. I would not say it if the Supreme Court of the United States had not said it. You propose to disregard the plain provisions of the Constitution, to undermine the structure of the Government itself.

We are powerless. We understand that. We stand alone. This is our question. We know that we must settle it. We can not shift this responsibility. The Federal Government can not assume it. In justice to my people I declare it to be my judgment that no other people on this earth could have done better. We are working day and night to build up a local public opinion that will help us to wipe this blot from my country, and I come here and ask you gentlemen not to disturb the work that we are doing. Read the newspapers from the South. Read the appeals of the governors of the South. Read the record of lynchings. We have reduced lynchings, nothwithstanding the increase in population, from an average of 112 a year to 63 last year. I know it is difficult.

I understand it; but, gentlemen, you must let us hold the responsibility upon the conscience of our community. That is what we appeal for. If you would abandon this superior, "holier than thou" attitude, stop your encouragement of southern Negroes to violate the social adjustment essential to the living together of large numbers of people of irreconcilable racial differences, we could make more rapid progress. We do not want to have our people lynch black men or white men. We do not want it. You know we do not want it. No man who claims to be decent could want it, but we know and you know—I challenge your judgment—that there is not a hand on the face of God Almighty's earth that can hold back the passions of the mob except the hand of the man who feels that it is up to him to intervene, the man who lives in the community, who will get up out of his bed at midnight and go out there and stand side by side with the prisoner who has committed a crime that has outraged the community. He is the only man on this earth who can do it, and I ask you not to destroy the sense of responsibility of men like this. And I ask you as man to man, do not add to the perils of our women as you would not want the South if we were in control here to add to the perils of your women by creating the impression in the minds of the ignorant savage, the brute bereft of every sense of social duty, of sympathy for the helpless, more brutal than the wild beasts of the fields, that the Federal Government is going to protect him against the people whose woman he violates. The solution of this problem must come from both ends. Racial divergencies, strained racial conditions which may develop in any community, out of which mob violence may arise, present their problems, but I believe it is the judgment of white men of the South generally that if the rape of white women can be stopped we can soon stop lynching. During all this debate there have been but few words of sympathy for the victim. Gentlemen, you are hindering us. We can appeal to the necessities and to the duty of self-respect, but no progress can be made by denouncing as cannibalistic, as I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to do the other day. The impulse of the man to kill when in the presence of the brute whose crime against nature, against innocence, against helplessness, against his woman, stirs in his soul the deepest and most primitive passions of which a good man is capable. Those passions must be controlled, but when they die the civilization is dead, the race is dead. The battle of the man against those passions he knows, and every man whose blood is red knows, has no kinship with the degradation out of which the appetite of the cannibal grows.

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I regret that I can not yield. Now, gentlemen, what are you going to do about it? I am talking to you as man to man, face to face. I am not talking now about the constitutional questions, the questions of governmental policy. That has been exhaustedly discussed. Aside from the concern which I have expressed with reference to the white women of the South, and especially those far away from police protection, who live under the shadow of this danger and under its torture almost from the beginning of consciousness; I have no concern for my white people. They will take care of themselves and give the best protection to their women which true manhood can give. I know that the white people of the South will take care of themselves; I appeal for the millions of black men and black women who have got to depend upon their white neighbors and the sense of responsibility of their white neighbors for protection against mob violence and against the vicious of the white race. [Applause.] They are the people I am appealing for. Oh, you can give them the shadow. You can pass this law. You can destroy the sense of local responsibility and get votes next election, but before God I say you have got no right to do it. You have no right to get your votes at the price of the security and the relatively happy situation of the millions of black people in the South. [Applause.]

Mr. HERRICK. Will the gentleman yield now for a question?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; I can not. I regret that I can not. Now, there is another thing that I want to say to you, and I hope I will not be misunderstood. I believe as firmly as I believe anything on this earth that the brutal, vicious black men, who are in the minority—there are relatively few of them—will misunderstand this legislation. I believe, men, that you are buying black votes with the safety of white women in the South. [Applause.] That is what I believe. I may be mistaken, but I know more about it than you do.

Mr. UPSHAW. You are not mistaken.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I believe it. I have said all I can say in my opening argument in opposition to this bill. I discussed the constitutional questions involved and the governmental policy involved. It is up to you. We have come to the Congress and now we will go to the country.

You can make your record here; you have got the power; but, believe me, gentlemen, if I know the American people we will not appeal in vain when we appeal from the judgment of this House to the judgment of the country. If there is anything left in the hearts of the country that ring true to the principles of the American Government, you will not make anything out of this politically. But that is not it; I wish almost that I had not made that statement, because in our debates we have our party conflicts, but, after all, we are American citizens. [Applause.] After all, we love our country; after all, our hearts ring true to the great principles. We may forget ourselves sometimes; we may forget ourselves under the influence of party expediency. Gentlemen, you have forgotten yourselves. Oh, may the shades of the great statesmen whose legislative works have made so glorious the statesmanship of this country come now within the Halls to guide the great party who under God's providence is charged with the responsibility of preserving the institutions of this country in this hour. O men, this a solemn moment in the history of this Government. You commit this Government to this policy and the institutions and civilization of this country will not endure, because when you destroy the sense of local responsibility you destroy the strength of the local government; and when you destroy the strength of the local government you destroy the foundations on which the institutions rest. [Applause.]

I thank you, gentlemen, for the attention you have given us. It is your power and your responsibility. The section of the country from which I come seems to me yet regarded as an alien section under suspicion, because when the Representatives come before you and make a solemn statement on their responsibility as Members of this Congress as to what they believe will be the effect of the proposed legislation their statements and their appeal falls on deaf ears. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of this matter there has been a constant charge that this bill is unconstitutional. I was somewhat surprised at the speaker who just left the floor—at the claim he made that every Republican in this House except myself believed the bill to be unconstitutional, but we are going to support it, notwithstanding such belief. That was neither charitable nor just.

Mr. UPSHAW. We excepted the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I believe there are a good many who are confident that the legislation is justifiable, and there is good reason to believe that the Supreme Court will sustain it. It has not been decided in any case that this kind of legislation is unconstitutional. This bill has been drawn on an entirely different principle from any law that has passed the scrutiny of the Supreme Court. I hope and believe that the Supreme Court will eventually hold that legislation along these lines is valid.

You must be aware that the Supreme Court is constantly invading, as the opposition calls it, State action in deciding property rights affected by the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. Every suit involving that amendment is subject to review by the Supreme Court of the United States after it has passed the highest court of the State if a person's rights under this amendment are denied. If you will go into any law library and take up any one of the late Supreme Court reports, you will find that a very large proportion of the cases are decided under the fourteenth amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; I have not the time.

The Supreme Court has under a statute passed by Congress the power to review the action of the State courts. It issues its writs against State courts and State officers, and in its mandates to State courts it directs judgments against the individual, just the same as though it was unhampered by any interference of the State courts. Now, that is the actual practice in civil cases.

And, as I called attention to in my former speech on this bill in the Southern Railroad Co. case, the Supreme Court sustained an injunction against a private individual who was seeking to collect a judgment that was void for lack of due process of law, a case that seems to me clearly rests on this amendment. That case, it seems to me, justifies Congress in proceeding against the individual, the one thing you claim we can not do. In effect the action of the Supreme Court in a vast majority of the civil cases it decides under the amendment only affects individuals, but its action is, directly or indirectly, dependent upon a failure of the State to afford protection guaranteed by the amendment. The Supreme Court has time and again intimated that the laws held void which have been passed by Congress heretofore are not dependent on any failure of the State to do its part under the amendment. In this bill we seek to make it dependent on the default of the State. I believe that if you are to construe this constitutional amendment correctly it must be construed so as to carry out the purpose of that amendment, which no one denies was to protect life as well as property, and you can not carry out that purpose unless you can reach the individual as well as the officers who make default.

Now, it is easy to stand here on this floor and denounce everything as unconstitutional. When we had the national prohibition act before Congress we had many speeches to the effect that it was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court did not take that view of it. I have had the experience that when a man is opposed to a law he usually claims that it is unconstitutional. I believe it to be true that if there is a wrong, and there is warrant in the Constitution for a remedy, it is the function of this body to apply the remedy. In this instance the Attorney General and his assistant have both expressed the opinion that this legislation is constitutional.

We know there is a grievous wrong, and we know that honest men differ as to the question of constitutional power to remedy the wrong. Even if we have some doubt on that point, we are, as I view it, as the Supreme Court said in one case, justified in having the question finally submitted to the courts, so the question can be settled. When we have done that we have done our duty. We can not justify doing less.

We owe it not only to the black man but we owe it to the white man as well to afford whatever protection we can, to the end that this infernal institution of practically legalized murder may come to an end, and the disgrace under which this Nation is suffering may be wiped out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. The bill as reported to the House has a complete substitute by way of amendment proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary. I suppose under the practice of the House we would first read the House bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The practice would be for the Clerk to read the bill to which the amendment has been offered and then read the substitute.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me—I do not know how the gentleman in charge of the bill or those opposed to it feel—that there ought to be some agreement under which proper debate can be had on the bill. Proper debate can not be had on the bill under this procedure.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would it not be in order for the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] to take that course at the conclusion of the reading of the first section of the original House bill, to offer the committee substitute, giving notice of a purpose then to move to strike out the other sections of the original bill as read?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in order.

Mr. MANN. That is clearly in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It would then be in order, would it not, to offer amendments to the amendment, one at a time?

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in order.

Mr. MANN. But no motion to strike out the last word of the amendment would be in order.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That would be an amendment in the third degree, and not in order, I presume.

The CHAIRMAN. The only way in which the bill could be open to amendment in the usual way would be to have the committee amendment considered in Committee of the Whole as an original bill.

Mr. MANN. That has been almost the invariable custom, by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. That could be done by unanimous consent, but in no other way.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I shall have to object to that.

Mr. MANN. Very well; we will put it through without debate. I just wanted to get the attitude of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The gentleman has it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any criminal prosecution shall have been instituted or any warrant of arrest shall have been issued, or any arrest shall have been made, or attempted, with the purpose and intent of criminal prosecution, in any State court, against any person within the jurisdiction of the State, whether he be a citizen of the United States or not, and such person shall appeal, as hereinafter provided, for the protection of the Government of the United States upon the ground that he has reasonable cause to apprehend that he will be denied the equal protection of the laws by the State within whose jurisdiction he is, or by any officer or inhabitant of such State, such person shall be entitled to the protection of the courts and officers of the United States to the end that the protection guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States may be given.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, with notice that if adopted I shall move to strike out subsequent sections of the bill when read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 1 and in lieu thereof insert the following:

"That the phrase 'mob or riotous assemblage,' when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

"SEC. 2. That if any State or governmental subdivision thereof fails, neglects, or refuses to provide and maintain protection to the life of any person within its jurisdiction against a mob or riotous assemblage such State shall by reason of such failure, neglect, or refusal be deemed to have denied to such person the equal protection of the laws of the State, and to the end that such protection as is guaranteed to the citizens of the United States by its Constitution may be secured it is provided:

"SEC. 3. That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty, or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assemblage, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to prevent such person from being so put to death, or any State or municipal officer charged with the duty of apprehending or prosecuting any person participating in such mob or riotous assemblage who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable efforts to perform his duty in apprehending or prosecuting to final judgment under the laws of such State all persons so participating, except such, if any, as are or have been held to answer for such participation in any district court of the United States, as herein provided, shall be guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding five years or by a fine of not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment.

"Any State or municipal officer acting as such officer having under authority of State law in his custody or control a prisoner, who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person to put such prisoner to death without authority of law as a punishment for some alleged public offense, or who shall conspire, combine, or confederate with any person to suffer such prisoner to be taken or obtained from his custody or control for the purpose of being put to death without authority of law as a punishment for an alleged public offense, shall be guilty of a felony, and those who so conspire, combine, or confederate with such officer shall likewise be guilty of a felony. On conviction the parties participating therein shall be punished by imprisonment for life or not less than five years.

"SEC. 4. The district court of the judicial district wherein a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall have jurisdiction to try and punish, in accordance with the laws of the State where the homicide is committed, those who participate therein, provided it is first made to appear to such court that the officers of the State charged with the duty of prosecuting such offense under the laws of the State fail, neglect, or refuse to apprehend or punish such participants, or that the jurors obtainable for service in the State court having jurisdiction of the offense are so strongly opposed to such punishment that there is no reasonable probability that those guilty of the offense can be punished in such State court. A failure for more than 30 days after the commission of such an offense to apprehend the persons guilty thereof shall be prima facie evidence of such failure, neglect, or refusal.

"SEC. 5. That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000, which sum may be recovered by an action therefor in the name of the United States against such county for the use of the family, if any, of the person so put to death; if he had no family, then to his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States. Such action should be brought and prosecuted by the district attorney of the United States of the district in which such county is situated in any court of the United States having jurisdiction therein. If such forfeiture is not paid upon recovery of a judgment therefor, such court shall have jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof by levy of execution upon any property of the county, or may compel the levy and collection of a tax therefor, or may otherwise compel payment thereof by mandamus or other appropriate process; and any officer of such county or other person who disobeys or fails to comply with any lawful order of the court in the premises shall be liable to punishment as for contempt and to any other penalty provided by law therefor.

"SEC. 6. That in the event that any person so put to death shall have been transported by such mob or riotous assemblage from one county to another county during the time intervening between his capture and putting to death, the county in which he is seized and the county in which he is put to death shall be jointly and severally liable to pay the forfeiture herein provided.

"SEC. 7. That any act committed in any State or Territory of the United States in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, which act constitutes a crime under the laws of such State or Territory, shall constitute a like crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, punishable in like manner as in the courts of said State or Territory, and within the period limited by the laws of such State or Territory, and may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States, and, upon conviction, the sentence executed in like manner as sentences upon convictions for crimes under the laws of the United States.

"SEC. 8. In construing and applying this act the District of Columbia shall be deemed a county, as shall also each of the parishes of the State of Louisiana.

"That if any section or provision of this act shall be held by any court to be invalid, the balance of the act shall not for that reason be held invalid."

At the conclusion of the reading of sections to the foregoing amendment the following occurred:

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee (interrupting the reading). Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is the Clerk reading the committee amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. He is reading an amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is not the committee amendment in order first?

Mr. MANN. The committee amendment would not come until the bill had been read through.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. As I understand it, he is not reading the proposed substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk is reading the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MANN. It is not proper to read the proposed substitute yet.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but it seems to me it would have been in order to offer the committee substitute.

Mr. MANN. It would have been in order if the gentleman had offered it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would not the committee substitute take preference over an amendment offered by the gentleman as an individual?

The CHAIRMAN. That is in the discretion of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Unless the committee substitute was offered by some gentlemen at the end of the reading of section 1, with the notice that was given, the substitute would not come before the Committee of the Whole until the original bill had been read through and amended.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know that I had any right to so understand it, but I assumed that the gentleman was going to offer the committee amendment. I did not know that he was going to discard the work of his committee and offer an individual proposition.

Mr. MANN. That has nothing to do with the parliamentary situation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Would it not be in order to offer the committee substitute?

The CHAIRMAN. The place at which the committee amendment would be in order would be at the conclusion of the bill when read. This amendment is offered at the conclusion of the reading of the first section. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the amendments.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] has offered an amendment, and has been recognized for five minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13 and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRINTING OF AMENDMENTS.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment which has just been read may be printed in the form of a bill, so that it may be used by the Members.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the amendment be printed as a bill for the use of the Members. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MACGREGOR, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence for three days on account of official business.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD on a bill which I have introduced—H. R. 9461.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the bill which he has introduced. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 1460. An act for the relief of the William Gordon Corporation;

H. R. 1318. An act granting to certain claimants the preferential right to purchase certain alleged public lands in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes;

H. R. 4598. An act to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii;

H. R. 2865. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent to J. D. Calhoun, of Lincoln Parish, La., certain lands;

H. R. 1459. An act for the relief of Charles R. Powell;

H. R. 9050. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Pamunkey Ferry Co. to construct a bridge across the Pamunkey River in Virginia;

H. R. 7600. An act authorizing the adjustment of the boundaries of the Deschutes National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes;

H. R. 7290. An act to confirm private-land claim of the widow and heirs of Joseph Etier; and

H. R. 6262. An act to add certain lands to Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska.

REPORT OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS, PANAMA RAILROAD CO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith, for the information of the Congress, the seventy-second annual report of the board of directors of the Panama Railroad Co. for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1921.

WARREN G. HARDING.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 25, 1922.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 53 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, January 26, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

KOREAN APPEAL FOR INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an appeal made by the representatives of Korea, signed also by former Senator Thomas, of Colorado, to the Conference on Limitation of Armament.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

SUPPLEMENTARY APPEAL TO THE CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT AND PACIFIC AND FAR EAST.

(By the Korean Mission.)

KOREAN MISSION,
CONTINENTAL TRUST BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1922.

TO THE CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

GENTLEMEN: Following the official announcement of their appointment by the President of the United States, the undersigned formally petitioned the American delegates to your conference to use their good offices in an effort to secure a hearing of the Korean appeal for the restoration of Korean independence. We endeavored to embody in that petition an outline of the history of Korea's annexation by Japan and the reasons justifying, if not requiring, the recognition by your conference of our right to be heard. In so doing, we emphasized the assertion that the wrongs inflicted upon Korea by Japan in disregard of treaty obligations and in defiance of the most obvious demands of justice, would, while they remained unrequited, constitute a far eastern problem of the first magnitude, and therefore calculated seriously to disturb, if not to defeat, any plan or covenant which might be accepted by your conference as tending to secure an enduring peace among the nations.

After presenting this petition to the American delegation a month elapsed without bringing a reply. The undersigned correctly assuming that none would be received then determined to appeal to all members of the conference. They thereupon prepared and presented to each and every one of them a petition elaborating their former one, which with other exhibits was appended thereto, thus embodying in composite form the case of Korea for your deliberate consideration and praying for an audience under whatever conditions might be prescribed, having faith in our cause and confident of maintaining it against all opposition. We are yet without an answer, albeit kindred problems, involving China and Siberia, have been made prominent features of your agenda since our first petition was delivered. This you have done because you perceive their solution to be indispensable to the ultimate object of your conference. China must be mistress in her own house. She must repossess Shantung; she must have both administrative and political independence; she must regulate her own domestic and foreign policies and work out her own destiny under the influence and with the friendly counsel of wholly disinterested powers, or Chinese problems will not cease to vex the peace of nations.

The right of Siberia to live her own life, be ruled by her own people under such forms and methods of government as they may determine to be immune from the invasion or the interference of alien powers is equally obvious. Her problems differ from those of China only in degree. They are essentially the same. And both are the fruit of Japanese intrigue and Japanese penetration. Both have their genesis in the ambitions and policies of a single power, which as a member of this conference and wholly committed to its purpose has happily consented to their consideration and therefore to their dispositions.

Korea rejoices that this is so. Her people devoutly hope for a happy and desirable understanding upon all these formidable differences. But they can not understand why this conference should give heed to them when presented by China and Siberia and refuse to consider them when presented by Korea. Their danger to the peace of the world is not due to the caprice of geography nor to the land of their origin. That inheres in their very structure without regard to whether they are in process or have reached the status of fait accompli.

Are you concerned with Japanese aggressions in China and Siberia because these countries have not yet been formally absorbed by the aggressor? Are you unconcerned about them in Korea because Japan has fully accomplished her object there?

The Korean problem has not been solved by annexation. Because the process has been completed should the protest of Korea pass unheeded? So reasoned the three great powers which submerged Poland. So thought Germany after she had torn Schleswig-Holstein from the side of Denmark, and compelled France to give Alsace-Lorraine. If history is "philosophy teaching by example," these illustrations justify the prediction that while you may pacify China and reassure Siberia, and thereby perform a great service to mankind, "peace will not come to abide with the sons of men" until the wrongs of Korea, more serious and indefensible than those of her neighbor States, shall have been considered and redressed. Every concession which Japan may through the intercession of the other powers make to China or to Siberia must constitute an acknowledgment of Korea's right to recognition. Every argument which the powers press upon her emphasizes Korea's plea for consideration, and every detail of their grievances is part of the warp and woof of Korea's indictment of her oppressor.

Korea is a nation whose Government has stood the test of more than 40 centuries. Hers is the oldest civilization of recorded time. Her population numbers 20,000,000. They are a distinctive race of people. They are possessed of characteristics, traditions, and institutions which are all their own. They have survived the welter of wars, plagues, conquest, and race assimilation. They are the primitive exponents and the last appeal to the right of self-determination. They are a unit against their forcible annexation to another and an alien Government. They are the innocent victims of broken or disregarded treaty covenants with every great power participating in this conference, which having been called expressly for the discussion of far eastern questions constitutes Korea's solitary medium for present relief. Should you adjourn without extending it, you would ignore the mandate which called you into being, disappoint the confidence of the world in the integrity of your purpose and the courage of your convictions unless Korea's petition be neard. The far eastern crisis, whose approach all men foresee and all nations dread, would not be avoided but only postponed. For justice can not in the last analysis of the world's affairs be denied to any great people suffering under oppression yet united in the determination to secure it. Korea striken down by the mailed hand of Japan asks that you hear her story before you adjourn. If you deny her that boon, she will continue her struggle for independence however much your silence may increase her burdens. There can be no peace until Korea has been rehabilitated, her Government restored, her people made free. Until then armies must be maintained and navies ride the sea. Conferences and nations may flourish and pass away, but justice alone endures.

By direction Korean mission.

HOSPITALIZATION OF EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as is well known to the Senate, I have for months been directing attention to the subject of hospitalization of ex-soldiers, and out of a spirit of fairness I feel it my duty to include in the RECORD decisions rendered by the Veterans' Bureau on important matters relating to this question. I therefore ask that the following letter be printed in the RECORD in 8-point type, together with the accompanying papers.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DISABLED VETERANS OF THE WORLD WAR,
Tucson, Ariz., January 6, 1922.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: The undersigned committee has been appointed by Tucson Chapter, No. 2, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, to take up with you the matter of certain regulations now in force in the Veterans' Bureau, with a view to the immediate change of such regulations, if possible.

The regulation which causes the greatest delay and discomfort to disabled veterans coming to Tucson for treatment is that regulation which requires the local officers of the Veterans' Bureau to communicate with the district office of San Francisco and receive authority from San Francisco before they can admit a patient to the United States Public Health Hospital No. 51 at Tucson. Unless a man is considered an emergency case he is compelled to wait from 10 days to 2 months at his own expense before authority to admit him to the hospital is received. According to the regulation, to be an emergency case a man must be almost dead, or at least he has to be in such a condition of health that he is liable to die before authority can be received from San Francisco. Many of these men reach Tucson absolutely penniless, and the Disabled American Veterans or some other charitable organization is compelled to provide something to eat and a place to sleep for them until authority has been received from San Francisco, when, as a matter of right and justice, these men are entitled to be taken care of at a Government hospital. In a great many cases when authority to hospitalize a man has finally been received we find that the authorities in charge of Hospital No. 51 announce that their hospital is full, and no other patients can be admitted until some patient has been discharged as an arrested case or for the violation of some hospital regulation.

We are informed that the regulation requiring this procedure is based upon that section of the Sweet bill which provides that in cases where the patient has left a Public Health hospital more than one time against medical advice he is subjected to disciplinary action. Disciplinary action in this case means the loss of two-thirds of his compensation for a period of four months and probably a forfeiture of his right to treatment at a public hospital. There really may be instances of certain isolated cases where this must be done, but it has become so that every disabled veteran who comes to Tucson to have treatment in the Public Health hospital is compelled to await the putting in motion and the final working out of this cumbersome machinery in order to ascertain whether or not he has left some other Public Health hospital against medical advice. In other words, we might say that hundreds of innocent men are made to suffer for the possible wrongdoing of one guilty man. This is not right, and we desire to protest to you, and through you to the Veterans' Bureau, against the further continuance of this iniquitous and unjust system.

It would seem that the only honest, fair, and upright policy for the Veterans' Bureau to follow would be the immediate revocation of this regulation and the substitution therefor of a regulation providing that: When any disabled veteran applies for treatment at any Public Health hospital, that he shall be admitted to treatment that very day and that the local authorities shall then communicate with the district office if necessary to find out whether or not that man has been guilty of the violation of that section of the Sweet bill mentioned above. In case it is found that he has so violated the provisions of the Sweet bill, he can then be dismissed from the hospital, and in case he is not guilty of any wrongdoing he would have only received that to which he is entitled. In that way possibly a few guilty men would receive a few nights' lodging and a few meals at the Government's expense to which they were not rightfully entitled, while in the workings of the present regulations hundreds of innocent men are denied that to which they are entitled by every legal or moral law.

Another minor problem is the matter of securing immediate dental treatment. Only yesterday a disabled veteran appeared at the local office of the Veterans' Bureau suffering intensely from a tooth which had been broken half off, thus leaving the nerve exposed. He wanted something done to relieve his suffering. Under the regulations all that the local office of the Veterans' Bureau could do for this man was to send a telegram to San Francisco to the district office requesting authority to have the man receive treatment. When this letter was written, 24 hours later, no word had been received from the San Francisco office, and the man has probably borrowed money or found some generous-hearted dentist who was willing to treat him on credit. If there is any sane or sensible reason why the director of the local office of the Veterans' Bureau should not have full and complete authority to grant treatment in emergency cases of this kind, we have been unable to discover it.

Another matter upon which we would solicit and earnestly urge your immediate and whole-hearted cooperation is the matter of the enlargement of the Public Health Hospital No. 51. We are told that there is room for more men at Camp Kearney, Calif., and at Whipple Barracks, at Prescott, but the fact remains that there has never been enough room at this hospital during the winter season. The weather at Prescott and at Camp Kearney at this season is such that men who are suffering from tuberculosis will not stay at these places during the winter season. As mentioned above, there have been cases where men have finally received authority and granted admission to the Public Health hospital here, only to find out that they can not be admitted because there is no room for them. It is very well to tell these men that they can go to Whipple Barracks or to Camp Kearney, but they know when you tell them that to go to either of these places in midwinter would be most certain to injure their health and possibly prove the death of some of them much earlier than would be the case if they were admitted to the hospital here. The climate is unquestionably far superior to that of any other part of the country during the winter months.

Please let us hear from you at your earliest possible convenience. Thanking you in advance for your earnest and sincere cooperation for the cause of the disabled veterans,

We are, sincerely,

CLAUDE SMITH,
PAUL F. WELLS,
CHAS. E. MANIER, Committee.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, January 20, 1922.

Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR ASHURST: I have your letter dated January 14, 1922, inclosing a letter from Tucson Chapter, No. 2, of the Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Tucson, Ariz.

Please refer to my letter to you dated January 6, 1922, giving a statement of the policy of the United States Veterans' Bureau as to the treatment of its beneficiaries suffering from tuberculosis in the State of Arizona.

The letter which you inclosed from the Tucson Chapter of the Disabled Veterans of the World War has received the very careful consideration of this office.

It is not the intention or desire of this office or any of our district offices that there shall be any delay in the proper hospitalization of any beneficiaries of this bureau when they are in need of hospital treatment.

We are not prepared at Tucson to care for an unlimited number of patients. We are prepared, however, to offer every beneficiary of the United States Veterans' Bureau who is present in Tucson and who needs hospital treatment proper hospitalization in modern, well-equipped tuberculosis sanatoria located at points climatically suitable for the treatment of tuberculosis. I quote from the next to the last paragraph of the inclosed letter:

> It is very well to tell these men that they can go to Whipple Barracks or to Camp Kearney, but they know when you tell them that to go to either of these places in midwinter would be most certain to injure their health and possibly prove the death of some of them much earlier than would be the case if they were admitted to the hospital here.

Our district medical officers have repeatedly offered to hospitalize all of our beneficiaries now in Tucson at Prescott, Ariz., or at our hospital in California, or at one of our hospitals in Colorado. The climate at Prescott, Ariz., at which place at the present time we have many empty beds, is eminently suited at any time of the year for the treatment of patients with tuberculosis.

May I quote a paragraph from a letter from the National Tuberculosis Association:

> The National Tuberculosis Association has maintained for a number of years that experience demonstrates that tuberculous patients can be treated successfully in selected locations in all parts of the United States, provided the main essentials are supplied, namely, strict medical supervision by physicians trained in the management of tuberculous cases, rest, fresh air, and an ample diet. These are fundamental factors in treatment, while climate can be considered as merely supplemental. The removal of patients to distant climates has the disadvantage of giving them treatment at great distances from their homes. This is particularly disadvantageous for the far-advanced cases as well as for indigent cases.

Further, I refer you to an inclosed resolution passed by the executive committee of the National Tuberculosis Association. A copy of this resolution was sent to our district medical officer in San Francisco, and he has sent us a copy of his reply to the Tucson Chapter No. 2, which indicates that any corrective measures necessary have been applied.

Referring to the paragraph about emergency dental treatment, it is possible that there may be some misunderstanding of the law on this subject by the Disabled Veterans' committee. Dental treatment is authorized by law when the dental condition has a connection with the man's military service. Dental work of all nature is not necessarily furnished by the Government to all ex-service men. It is only furnished, as stated above, when they have a dental condition or disease which has been incurred or aggravated by their military service. We are sending a copy of our letter to our district manager in San Francisco, and he will take such action as may be necessary to enable beneficiaries of this bureau to receive prompt dental treatment.

Based on the statements contained in our letter to you of January 6, 1922, the bureau does not feel justified in recommending additional hospital facilities at Tucson, Ariz. I request that you cause it to be known that any of our beneficiaries who may be in Tucson, Ariz., will be provided with suitable hospital treatment if they will apply to our subdistrict office at 809 East Third Street, Tucson, Ariz.

I would further appreciate and thank you to send me the names of any beneficiaries of this bureau who need hospital treatment and who apply to our subdistrict office in Tucson, Ariz., and who are refused hospitalization. When we have supplied to us something definite we are in a position to take immediate corrective action.

Very truly, yours, C. R. FORBES,
Director United States Veterans' Bureau.

[Inclosure.]

The following resolution has been approved by the executive committee of the National Tuberculosis Association through a special committee appointed for the purpose:

Whereas the Veterans' Bureau and other departments and officers of the Government have from time to time had great pressure brought to bear to provide special hospital facilities for tuberculous ex-service men in regions where patients themselves have congregated, usually because of the supposed special curative power of the climate; and

Whereas experience has demonstrated climate to be a minor factor in the treatment of tuberculosis, and that good results may be attained in selected locations in all sections of the country, thus making it possible for patients to receive proper treatment reasonably close to their homes; and

Whereas the establishment of sanatoria in such communities as Deming, N. Mex., is inadvisable, and in Tucson and Phoenix, Ariz., would require extra institutional provisions in other regions during the hot summer months; and

Whereas adequate provisions are already established or planned for at Fort Bayard, N. Mex.; Prescott, Ariz.; in California, North Carolina, Colorado, and other excellent regions in the United States: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the executive committee of the National Tuberculosis Association urges the Veterans' Bureau and other departments responsible for the establishment of sanatoria to refuse to accede to requests that institutions be established merely to satisfy the desires of patients or the demands of political and commercial constituencies, but rather that new institutions be located or existing institutions be expanded only upon the best medical advice obtainable.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, several days ago I called the attention of the Senate to propaganda of the Fertilizer Trust and the Power Trust against legislation for the development of Muscle Shoals. I am receiving, and other Senators inform me they are receiving, many letters and circulars from men connected with the Water Power Trust in the South, and the Fertilizer Trust in the South and East, in which they are urging action against legislation that will enable Henry Ford or anyone else to have the Muscle Shoals plant. They seem to be exceedingly anxious to prevent Ford from leasing it. They say there is plently of other water power in Georgia and the South that ought to be developed. They use every argument against it that can be thought of.

Some of the letters I receive are from my personal friends who urge me to keep confidential anything that they write me in connection with the matter, and of course I can not divulge what they have written me, but they use every argument possible to prejudice me against the lease of this property.

I also wish to place certain other matters in the RECORD showing what the Fertilizer Trust is doing to defeat this legislation.

The development of Muscle Shoals was primarily for the manufacture of nitrogen in times of war for the manufacture of munitions, while in times of peace it was to be operated for the manufacture of fertilizers to be furnished the farmers at about cost and dispose of the power for manufacturing purposes at cheap rates. This would save the Government the expense of operating it in peace times while we need it for munitions only in war times, and we hope and pray it may be a long while before we shall ever have another war. We hope it may never take place.

We are the only country in the world of any size that has not a plant to manufacture nitrogen, so as to enable them to manufacture munitions in time of war. That is the principal object of the Muscle Shoals plant development. It costs the Government far more to maintain plants of this kind than it would a corporation or individual. The Government is exceedingly fortunate in getting a responsible party to take over the plant and operate it during peace times, so as to save the farmers of the country from the high prices of fertilizers charged by the Fertilizer Trust, and at the same time bring manufacturers of that section actual competition and lower rates for water power.

which is controlled by the Water Power Trust in that section of the country. While all this is helpful and desirable, the most important matter in connection with the lease, so far as the Government is concerned, is the fact that without expense to the Government in times of peace this plant will be profitable to the Government, and should we have war it would be taken over and used in the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I desire to indorse what the Senator from Georgia has said. This propaganda has been going on for quite a while. The Fertilizer Trust and other interests are doing everything in their power to keep Henry Ford from having the deal put over so that he can take charge of the Muscle Shoals project.

I think the best thing the Government can do is to turn this project over to Henry Ford, accepting his bid; and I hope the Secretary of War will immediately recommend that Congress accept it and save $100,000,000 or more that has already been expended at Muscle Shoals and complete a nitrogen plant which will supply us with nitrogen in time of war and can give the farmers of the South and West at a reasonable price fertilizer in time of peace.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I send to the desk a resolution asking for an investigation of the lobby that it is believed is here.

I wish to say that I have never indorsed the offer of Henry Ford or anyone else. We have an able Secretary of War handling the matter with the assistance of the Army engineers—who are reflected on in some of this propaganda of the fertilizer trust. These engineers are among the ablest men in their profession, not only of this country but anywhere in the world. The Army engineers have handled hundreds of millions of dollars in Government contracts and there has only been one man connected with the Army engineers in all the history of Government of whom there has been any suspicion of corruption. Congress is fortunate in having the advice of such able and conscientious men as the Army engineers and the Secretary of War.

I ask that the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The reading clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 227), as follows:

Whereas it has been publicly charged that various persons, associations, corporations, and combinations interested in the production of fertilizers, commonly known as the Fertilizer Trust, and various persons, associations, corporations, and combinations interested in the production and transmission of power, commonly known as the Water Power Trust, have been and are engaged in extensive propaganda and in the maintenance of a lobby to defeat any plans for and to prevent the lease or other disposition by the Government of the Muscle Shoals plant and project: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee composed of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate such charges and the activities of any such persons, associations, corporations, or combinations and to report its findings to the Senate with such recommendations as it deems proper. Such committee is authorized to hold hearings and to sit during the recesses or sessions of the Sixty-seventh Congress, at such times and places as it may deem avisable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings and findings at a cost not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, the expenses of such investigation to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask that the resolution lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the National Fertilizer Association, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., is sending to Members of Congress newspapers and other circulars like the following, and on these you will notice they state: "The National Fertilizer Association, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., will be glad to furnish you further information on this subject."

One letter I received urging me to vote against leasing this plant to Henry Ford was on stationery of one of the water-power trust companies in the South which would compete with Muscle Shoals plant:

TRUTH ABOUT MUSCLE SHOALS—HOW A GREAT WATER-POWER PROJECT IS BEING USED TO FORWARD PLANS FOR GOVERNMENT COMPETITION IN FIELD OF PRIVATE INDUSTRY, WITH A STATEMENT OF PRINCIPLES THAT SHOULD BE APPLIED TO SECURE THIS DEVELOPMENT FREE FROM PATERNALISM.

[The National Fertilizer Association, John D. Toll, secretary, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.]

MUSCLE SHOALS CAN NOT REDUCE FERTILIZER PRICES EXCEPT AT TAXPAYERS' EXPENSE.

MEANING OF CHART NO. 3.

If the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant were operated, its principal product would be sulphate of ammonia.

But sulphate of ammonia sells wholesale at less than cost to produce it by the expensive Muscle Shoals process.

Even the retail prices paid by farmers for sulphate of ammonia delivered in their locality in bags, with freight paid, are in many instances as low as the bare cost of producing it at Muscle Shoals.

Price shown on chart is average of prices reported weekly in Oil, Paint and Drug Reporter.

Cost shown on chart is based upon original estimate of War Department, corrected to conform to subsequent War Department estimate of cost of power, and with necessary overhead items added, except taxes.

The National Fertilizer Association, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., will be glad to furnish you further information on this subject.

SMALL PART OF FERTILIZER BILL WOULD BE AFFECTED BY OPERATION OF MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

MEANING OF CHART NO 2.

If the Muscle Shoals nitrate plant were operated, its principal product would be sulphate of ammonia.

Sulphate of ammonia, such as could be produced at Muscle Shoals, represents an average of only about 4 cents on every dollar on money paid by American farmers for commercial fertilizer.

Obviously, no matter how cheap the Muscle Shoals plant could make sulphate of ammonia, it could not greatly reduce the cost of commercial fertilizer.

The National Fertilizer Association, 1010 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa., will be glad to furnish you further information on this subject.

BONUS FOR EX-SOLDIERS.

Mr. MCKINLEY. Mr. President, I present a telegram from the Tricity Manufacturers' Association, of Moline and Rock Island, Ill., and Davenport, Iowa, concerning the bonus bill. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MOLINE, ILL., January 25, 1922.

HON. WILLIAM MCKINLEY,
Washington, D. C.:

We are unanimously opposed to the provisions of the proposed soldiers' bonus legislation involving general bonus, whether paid in cash or certificates. Practically all business in this community is at a standstill. When operating at all it is at a loss. There is great unemployment. Further burdens invite disaster.

TRICITY MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION.

CALL OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	McKellar	Robinson
Ball	France	McKinley	Sheppard
Bursum	Gooding	McNary	Simmons
Cameron	Hale	Moses	Spencer
Capper	Harris	Nelson	Underwood
Caraway	Heflin	Norris	Wadsworth
Colt	Johnson	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Page	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Kellogg	Pepper	Warren
Dial	La Follette	Poindexter	Williams
Ernst	Lenroot	Ransdell
Fernald	McCumber	Reed

Mr. CURTIS. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] are detained on business of the Senate.

I was also requested to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] are detained at a meeting of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DIAL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on business of the Senate. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is absent on account of illness.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD] is absent from the Senate on official business.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to make the same announcement as that just made by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] with reference to my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. SWANSON answered to his name when called.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Broussard	Kenyon	Phipps	Sterling
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Shortridge	Swanson
Glass	Nicholson	Stanfield	Townsend
Harreld

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] and the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] on account of official business in connection with a hearing before a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

EXPRESSIONS ON DEATH OF SENATOR PENROSE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of State informing the Senate of the sympathy expressed by the Italian ambassador to the United States and the Italian Government on the death of Senator BOIES PENROSE. It will be printed in the RECORD.

The communication is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, January 24, 1922.

The VICE PRESIDENT,
United States Senate.

SIR: I have the honor to state for the information of the Senate that in a message, dated January 4, 1922, his excellency, Senator Vittorio Rolandi Ricci, Italian ambassador at Washington, expresses his deep regret at the death of the late Senator BOIES PENROSE, of Pennsylvania, and his and the Italian Government's condolence with the Senate.

I have the honor to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

REINTERMENT OF SOLDIER DEAD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Quartermaster General of the Army, transmitting lists of American soldier dead returned from overseas, to be reinterred in the Arlington (Va.) National Cemetery, Thursday, January 26, 1922, at 2.30 p. m. The communication will lie on the desk of the Secretary for the information of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the city council of Manitowoc, Wis., favoring modification of the prohibition law so as to permit the manufacture and sale of beers and light wines, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the city council of Baltimore, Md., favoring modification of the prohibition law so as to permit the manufacture and sale of beers and light wines, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a petition of the Private Soldiers' and Sailors' Legion of the United States of America, praying for the prompt enactment of legislation relative to the disposition of the Government property at Muscle Shoals, Ala., in connection with the offer of Mr. Henry Ford, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McLEAN presented a resolution adopted by employees of the East Main Street plant of the Bridgeport Brass Co., of Bridgeport, Conn., favoring inclusion of the American valuation plan in the pending tariff bill, so as to enable manufacturers to better meet foreign competition and maintain the American standard of living for employees, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of 14 employees of the Winsted Manufacturing Co., of Winsted, Conn., favoring inclusion in the pending tariff bill of a protective tariff on scythes, corn knives, and grass hooks, etc., so as to enable the manufacturers to better meet foreign competition and maintain the American standard of living for employees, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented memorials of the staffs of the department of chemistry, the school of law, the department of mathematics, various members of the faculty, and sundry other professors, all of Yale University, New Haven, Conn., remonstrating against the proposed duty on reference and textbooks as contained in the pending tariff bill and urging their retention on the free list, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from employees of the Caldwell Colt Robinson Post, No. 254, Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Hartford, Conn., favoring immediate passage of the so-called fourfold soldiers' adjusted compensation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the Men's Sunday Club, of South Congregational Church, of New Britain, Conn., praying for the enactment of the so-called Jones-Miller antimorphia bill, providing for the protection of Chinese from American manufacturers alleged to be engaged in shipping morphia to be smuggled into China, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Parent-Teachers' Association, of Mystic, Conn., indorsing the efforts of the administration toward peace, especially the abolition of illegal warfare, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petitions of Jennie L. Williams, of Hartford; Julia A. Waechter, of Sound Beach; and Marion C. Frenyear, of Thompsonville, all in the State of Connecticut, praying that Congress grant relief to the suffering peoples of Austria, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of members of Ben Miller Council, No. 11, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Danbury, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to create a department of education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented petitions of members of Sarah Ludlow Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Seymour, and of Saray Whitman Trumbull Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Watertown, both in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of Senate bill 1967, creating a national military park at Yorktown, Va., which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1730) for the relief of Philip S. Everest (Rept. No. 453);

A bill (S. 1814) for the relief of the owner of the steam lighter Cornelia (Rept. No. 454); and

A bill (S. 1817) for the relief of the owners of the schooner Horatio G. Foss (Rept. No. 455).

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1813) for the relief of the owner of the steamer Mayflower and for the relief of passengers on board said steamer, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 456) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 3074) providing for a Good Roads Association convention cancellation stamp to be used by the Phoenix, Ariz., post office; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. JONES of Washington:

A bill (S. 3075) granting an increase of pension to Newton J. Ward (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3076) to create a bureau of aeronautics in the Department of Commerce, to encourage and regulate the operation of civil aircraft in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Commerce.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIAL. Mr. President, I have heard a suggestion in favor of raising additional taxes by compelling the placing of stamps on bank checks. In behalf of small bank depositors, I wish to protest against that proposition. We had such a provision of law during the Spanish-American War, though we did not resort to that expedient even during the World War.

Mr. President, as a matter of fact, the banks of the country serve a great purpose in receiving deposits. A large number of people in many parts of the country have no suitable place in which to safeguard their earnings, and are therefore glad to be able to deposit them in some safe institution. Now to provide that a stamp shall be placed on bank checks would impose a considerable burden upon bank depositors, and especially on the small depositors.

I repeat, it is a great convenience and accommodation to the people to be able to deposit their money in the banks. Many of the bank depositors probably live in the country where they have no facilities for obtaining stamps. If we provide that stamps shall be placed on checks, it will very much retard business. I consider it would be the imposition of an entirely unnecessary burden, and it would be a greater burden on the people than would be compensated for by the amount of revenue which the Government would receive therefrom.

We are desirous that the people shall save their earnings; we wish them to deposit them where, in the first place, they will be safe, and, in the next place, where they will yield them some return. In my section of the country we have been endeavoring to educate the people along this line for a long time. Bank checks serve two or three purposes, one of which is that they take the place of a receipt in the payment of bills, and they are beneficial to the depositor for that reason.

Young man as I am, I remember a time in my county in South Carolina when we had no bank, but to-day there are a dozen banks in that county. By reason of the deposits which have been made in those banks we have been able to build up a great many enterprises which would not have been built up if it had not been for the establishment of the banks.

Not only that, Mr. President, but we need to have all the money in circulation which we can get. If people hoard their money at home, it is liable to be burned up, or they are liable to be robbed, and, furthermore, the people at large are deprived of the benefit of having that much money in circulation.

I, therefore, think it would be very unwise, indeed, now to take what I regard to be a step backward by the imposition of a stamp on bank checks. I repeat that we did not resort to that expedient for raising taxes even during the World War, at a time when we would not have opposed such a tax or, indeed, have hesitated to resort to almost any means of raising taxes. Now, at a time when it is desired by all that this country shall get back to normal conditions as soon as possible, it would be particularly unwise to enact such a proposal into legislation.

It is true that it helps the bank to receive deposits, but, as a matter of fact, banks are now paying interest on such deposits where their amount is at all appreciable. However, the depositing of money in banks helps the people tremendously in the sections where the banks are located. What we particularly need in my section of the country is credit and capital with which to do business. If we adopt this proposal, we shall force people to hoard their money in old tin cans, to hide it around the house, and to resort to practices of that sort. I think it will be a step very far backward.

Not only that, but the banks in the poorer sections of the country need all the help they can get. Some people have an idea that the profits of the banks are great, but that is an entire mistake. I know of no institution in the world that serves the public so much entirely free of cost as does a bank. The bank is a place where one may deposit his money, get his change, get his exchange, as a rule, free of cost to the customer. The amount of purely accommodation work done by a bank is greater, I am sure, than that which is done by any other institution of which I am aware.

It is claimed that the rate of interest which may be charged by the banks is fixed at, say, 7 or 8 per cent, according to the laws of the different States, and that is true; but that is no guaranty at all that the banks will make any such return. They can not charge over that rate; but it would be a very poor business, indeed, which could not make more money than does a bank, if people were in the business for the money which they make out of it. I presume that, taking the average in South Carolina, or even in the entire South to-day, for the last 12 months or 2 years the banks have probably lost money. I question whether they have been able to pay their dividends out of their earnings. If they have paid dividends at all, it has perhaps been done out of their surplus and not out of their yearly earnings. The financial question is a serious problem in my section of the country. We need more banking capital. Perhaps we may have now a sufficient number of small banks, but our borrowing power is very much limited.

A short time ago it was brought to my attention by a banking institution that their taxes amounted to 5 per cent upon their capital stock. Anyone may figure that out for himself and see where in such a case the profit would come to an institution of that sort. Banks are composed, as a rule, of a large number of small stockholders, often women and children who have a few surplus dollars and who need the dividend or interest upon which to live. Often these stockholders could not go into business such as merchandising, farming, and the like.

The law now requires that stamps be placed on notes. Although we would not be justified perhaps in making any great complaint about it, I feel that that imposes a handicap. Anyway it makes the borrower pay that much more for his accommodation.

The banks all over the country, Mr. President, served the Government faithfully and efficiently during the war. They helped float the bonds issued by the Government; they did a great deal of free work; they acted as secretaries to many organizations, and they did their duty. I do not claim that they did any more than their duty, but they did their full duty, and I hope now that the burden which is proposed will not be placed particularly upon the small depositors of the banks. I think it would be unwise and uncalled for, and would be resorting to a policy which in my opinion is out of date.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, while I am aware of the fact that a Senator may discuss any subject, no matter what bill may be pending before the Senate, may I give expression to the hope that we may now consider the bill that is before the Senate and dispose of it, if we can, to-day?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I offer an amendment which I will ask to have read, and then I shall make a few rambling remarks concerning it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from California will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 2 it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 2½. When, under and in accordance with section 2, the said commission shall with any country reach an agreement of adjustment, settlement, or refunding, such agreement before it is consummated and becomes final shall be reported to and be approved by Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the original bill that was presented upon this subject was obviously unsatisfactory to the Finance Committee, and unquestionably, I think, would have been denied passage by the Senate because of its provisions giving unlimited authority in the fashion that it did. There was considerable disapproval manifested, and I assume, because of that disapproval, the bill has been reported now in amended form.

I am very glad to say, Mr. President, that the bill in its amended form is infinitely superior to, immeasurably better than, the bill as originally presented. I am very glad, too, from the explanation and the exposition of the chairman of the Finance Committee, to observe that the Finance Committee regards this measure as dealing only because of necessity with the interest that is due from the different foreign nations unto ours. I do not mean that the scheme of refunding relates alone to interest, but I refer to the statement, iterated and reiterated by the chairman of the Finance Committee, that the necessity for the bill rests in the interest due and not because the funding, settlement, or adjustment can not effectually be had under existing authority.

The bill, Mr. President, to my mind, is one of very great importance. The financial transaction involved is the most stupendous the world has ever seen; it exceeds, indeed, any amount in transactions financial that Governments have ever before had existing between them, and its importance upon various world conditions, upon, perhaps, our own, can not be overestimated.

It is a matter of very great regret to me, Mr. President, that a bill of such extraordinary importance, involving as it does the most momentous financial transaction the world has ever seen, has so little attention apparently either from the public or from the legislative branch of the Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to inquire of the Senator, in view of the fact that there are present only five Senators on the other side of the Chamber and not very many more on this side, if he would object to a quorum being called. I should like to have the Senator's speech heard by more Senators than are here now.

Mr. JOHNSON. I prefer, Mr. President, that the call be not made——

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Because I recognize that during the progress of the argument on this bill there have not been, perhaps, half the number present during most of the discussion that are present to-day, although there is a very small number present here now, and, if a call were made, it would result, I think, merely in Senators answering the call and immediately leaving. However, that is a matter of little consequence. We can all express our views upon a measure of this sort as we see the measure; and as I see this measure there ought at least to be attached to it the amendment which I have suggested.

The authority for the loans that were made by our Government to foreign Governments has been adverted to repeatedly, but, in order that sequentially that authority may be seen, I shall refer very briefly to the Liberty loan acts. Of course, Mr. President, during the stress of war when we were confronted by the necessity of acting with celerity and when we did not weigh, as of course we ought not to have weighed, the consequences of acts which were essential for the success of our arms and the arms of our allies, we did not pause to consider the legality of what we might do in the matter of these loans. I do not criticize that at all; but, on the contrary, the issue was so great that I justify the speed with which we passed those bills, and I justify the Congress and the administration responsible for those acts and for those loans, because there was a unanimity of sentiment at that time that they were essential for the successful completion of the operations in which our military forces were engaged; but, Mr. President, there is no such emergency presented to-day; there is no danger confronting us, and we should not be deterred from a careful scrutiny or from acting with caution, and possibly, from that caution, with wisdom in a matter of this moment. To-day there is no war, with all its horrors and with all its necessities for immediate action that command of us that we do that which perhaps we might rue in the future, or that we do that from which there might be possible consequences, either from the establishment of a precedent or from affirmative action, which in the days to come we might regret. And so, Mr. President, upon this bill I do hope that there will be the utmost argument and the fullest discussion. I realize that words of mine are of little or of no consequence, and that the scant attention that has been paid to the measure thus far does not augur well for a future attention to it which might enable us to obtain from it all that possibly its various sentences may imply.

Returning now to the original authority that was accorded, let us look at it for just a moment.

The first Liberty loan act, which was approved April 24, 1917, contained this provision:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act, to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

I read that provision to show that in the very beginning of the loans that were made by this country the Congress provided what obligations and what manner of obligations should be accepted. Under this act various obligations of foreign Governments were accepted; and then, finally, because the Treasury Department had accepted demand obligations from foreign Governments under the first Liberty loan act, the second Liberty loan act provided in section 3 as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, from time to time, to exercise in respect to any obligation of foreign Governments acquired under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, any privilege of conversion into obligations bearing interest at a higher rate provided in or pursuant to this act or said act approved April 24, 1917, and to convert any short-time obligations of foreign Governments which may have been purchased under the authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, into long-time obligations of such Governments, respectively, maturing not later than the bonds of the United States then last issued under authority of this act or of said act approved April 24, 1917, as the case may be, and in such form and terms as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

And so forth, and then by the subsequent third and fourth Liberty loan act the indebtedness that was authorized to be created was totaled at $10,000,000,000.

We have, therefore, the Liberty loan acts specially stating the obligations that shall be received, and giving in themselves authority unto the Secretary of the Treasury respecting those obligations. I stress this idea of authority accorded the Secretary of the Treasury because it seems to me to demonstrate that there is no necessity of passing the bill that is presented here to-day unless it be, as the chairman of the Finance Committe says, concerning the single item of overdue interest.

I am unable to see, although I accept his statement as final in that regard, why, with the authority respecting the principal, that authority does not extend to the interest as well; and that this very construction has been placed upon the power thus accorded is evidenced by the obligations accepted.

In order that the character of the obligations accepted may be known, I want to read the form of certificate or obligation taken from all foreign Governments. This is the official form taken from all foreign Governments:

The Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of ——— on demand, with interest from the date hereof at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Such principal sum and the interest thereon will be paid at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York, or, at the option of the holder, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington, in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness, or, at the option of the holder, at the Bank of England, London, England, in pounds sterling at the fixed rate of $4.76⅞ to the pound sterling, and at any such place of payment without deduction for any British taxes, present or future.

This certificate will be converted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, at par, with an adjustment of accrued interest, into an equal par amount of 5 per cent convertible gold bonds of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland conforming to the provisions of acts of Congress of the United States known, respectively, as second Liberty bond act, third Liberty bond act, and fourth Liberty bond act. If bonds of the United States issued under authority of said acts shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent per annum, a proportionate part of the obligations of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of this series acquired by the United States under authority of said acts shall, at the request of said Secretary of the Treasury, be converted into obligations of said Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland bearing interest at a rate exceeding that previously borne by this obligation by the same amount as the interest rate of the bonds of the United States issued upon such conversion exceeds the interest rate of 4½ per cent but not less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States.

There are the obligations now subsisting, held by the United States against the various Governments of Europe to which we have loaned our funds. In the acts and in the obligations there is the authority specifically given to the Secretary of the Treasury under the terms therein mentioned to convert, to refund, or to adjust in accordance with those terms the indebtedness now subsisting. I do not, therefore, quite understand the necessity for the bill that is here presented. Because of the authority plainly stated in the Liberty loan acts, because of the provisions specifically detailed in the obligations themselves, I do not quite comprehend why it is necessary for us to legislate now and legislate in advance so that what may be done hereafter by the commission provided for by this bill may, without knowledge upon our part except so far as the specific terms of the act provide, be done, and be done finally and conclusively.

Mr. President, the chairman of the Finance Committee very ably and very eloquently presented the financial condition of the different States of Europe. He said we ought not to be a Shylock in dealing with them. I agree with him, and I agree with him thoroughly in that regard. We ought not, of course, to be exercising the part of the inhuman or the cruel creditor, and none of us would do that at all. Why the remark should be made I am unable to see, because if there has ever been a lax Government in dealing with its obligations—obligations of such transcendent importance as these—that Government has been ours.

Mr. President, during the very time that our debtors have defaulted in interest, at least one of them has charged us interest. During the very time that we forgave, for the period, the interest due to us from Great Britain, we were paying to Great Britain interest upon smaller obligations incurred by us during the war, the obligations being for the transportation of our troops across the ocean and the transportation of our troops across the English Channel—obligations that of course we were very glad to meet, and we were very glad to meet them at any time; but upon the obligations that were claimed to be due by us for sending our troops across the water, within the past year we paid interest amounting to a very large sum.

I do not criticize the present administration or the Secretary of the Treasury for this. It is asserted to me by the Secretary of the Treasury that the interest was paid because of an agreement that was entered into of which he was no part and of which this administration was no part. The agreement, indeed, may have been a just one. I do not know and I am not in a position to say that it was unjust or that it ought not to have been made; but the fact is that during the period that default was made by Britain in the payment of interest to us Britain charged us interest upon the funds due to Britain for shipping our men across the sea and for taking them across the English Channel.

That I may do no injustice to the Secretary of the Treasury in this regard I want to put in the RECORD as part of my remarks his letter dated last September to me in response to an inquiry made concerning the payment of this interest; and that he may be set entirely right I want to read a portion of that letter, wherein he refers to the arrangement that was made for the payment of this interest.

During the latter part of 1919—

Says the Secretary—

an arrangement was made between the United States Treasury and the British Treasury whereby the British Government, in consideration of waiving its right to the establishment of certain credits which the Treasury had agreed to establish in its favor under the Liberty bond acts, and in further consideration of its assenting to the withdrawal by the Treasury of certain other credits already established in its favor under such acts, was relieved by the Treasury of its obligation under a prior agreement to apply upon British obligations held by the Treasury cash received from departments of this Government. I have called the above understanding to your attention in order that you may be informed of the reason why the Treasury could not, in the circumstances, properly insist that the British Government should permit the amount due it under the Raeburn-Connor agreement to be applied as a partial reduction of its indebtedness to this Government.

Annexed to the letter is a copy of the agreement and an exhibit showing the statement of account of the British Government with the United States War Department. In this statement of account interest is charged upon their claim of $11,000,000 and upon ours for supplies furnished of $5,000,000, making a balance of $6,000,000 interest under that statement of account paid by the United States to Great Britain.

I ask unanimous consent that this letter and the documents annexed to it may be printed in full in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, September 17, 1921.

Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I received your letter of September 10, 1921, in which you ask for the date on which a sum aggregating $5,000,000 or $6,000,000 was paid by this Government to Great Britain as interest upon the amount due to Great Britain for transporting our soldiers across the seas. You also request information as to the dates and amounts paid to Great Britain since the armistice for transportation of our troops or supplies.

I am not aware that any sum as large as that you mention has been paid by the United States as interest upon the indebtedness referred to. The records of this department show that on June 27, 1921, the Treasury made a payment of $33,108,922.29 to the British ministry of shipping under a certificate of the Auditor for the War Department finding that amount due. The certificate was based on the so-called Raeburn-Connor agreement of March 3, 1921, which purported to be in final settlement of all outstanding transportation claims between the War Department and the British ministry of shipping during the period from April 6, 1917, to the date of the agreement. The payment represented the principal sum of $32,577,858.57 and $531,063.72 interest at 5 per cent from March 1, 1921, to June 27, 1921. I take pleasure in inclosing for your information a copy of the agreement referred to.

I beg to invite your attention to Exhibit A, attached to the agreement, from which it would appear that the War Department had prior to March 3, 1921, made payments on account in the amount of $67,410,665.93. The Treasury is without information as to the dates on which such payments were made. Presumably they were made by disbursing officers of the War Department, and the accounts relative thereto should now be in the possession of the Comptroller General of the United States, whose office, as you know, is independent of this department. May I suggest, therefore, that if you desire more exact information regarding such payments you communicate with the Comptroller General. The Secretary of War also may be in a position to furnish you with the information in question.

During the latter part of 1919 an arrangement was made between the United States Treasury and the British treasury whereby the British Government in consideration of waiving its right to the establishment of certain credits which the Treasury had agreed to establish in its favor under the Liberty bond acts, and in further consideration of its assenting to the withdrawal by the Treasury of certain other credits already established in its favor under such acts, was relieved by the Treasury of its obligation under a prior agreement to apply upon British obligations held by the Treasury cash received from departments of this Government. I have called the above understanding to your attention in order that you may be informed of the reason why the Treasury could not in the circumstances properly insist that the British Government should permit the amount due it under the Raeburn-Connor agreement to be applied as a partial reduction of its indebtedness to this Government.

Cordially, yours, A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

This agreement made on the 3d day of March, 1921, between the War Department of the United States of America (hereinafter called the War Department), acting through Brig. Gen. W. D. Connor, special representative of the Secretary of War, on the one part, and His Britannic Majesty's Government (hereinafter called the Ministry of Shipping), acting through the Ministry of Shipping, by Sir E. Manifold Raeburn, special representative of the British Government, on the other part, is an evidence of final settlement of all bills, accounts, and claims of every nature on the part of either party against the other for transactions connected with the transportation of personnel or materials or other transportation services arising out of the recent war with Germany and her allies during the period from April 6, 1917, to the date of this agreement. The parties to this agreement having jointly considered the unsettled claims of each against the other, which claims were specially exempted from the so-called Burr-Niemeyer agreement of November 23, 1920, by section 1, article 3, thereof, and desiring to make a complete and final settlement of all such mutual claims, have agreed, as follows:

ARTICLE I.

AGREED INDEBTEDNESS.

The total sum due from the War Department to the Ministry of Shipping as found after mutual consideration, adjustment, and agreement is $109,173,867.57, and the total sum due from the Ministry of Shipping to the War Department so found is $76,596,009, leaving a net balance due from the War Department to the Ministry of Shipping of $32,577,858.57, which sum it is mutually agreed is justly due from the War Department to the Ministry of Shipping. The composition of these sums is in general set forth in an exhibit marked "A" annexed hereto and made a part hereof. The United States will pay the above sum found justly due as provided in article 3 hereof.

ARTICLE II.

MUTUAL RELEASES.

The Ministry of Shipping does hereby fully, completely, and in all things release and discharge the War Department, and no other department of the United States Government, and the War Department does hereby fully, completely, and in all things release and discharge the Ministry of Shipping, and no other department of the British Government, from all bills, accounts, claims, and obligations of any nature which either of the contracting parties now has or may have against the other in connection with the transportation of personnel or materials or other transportation services, whether arising out of delivery or contract for the delivery of materials, supplies, or equipment, or for services rendered or contracted to be rendered, or for damages for the use of properties of one or the other, or in any otherwise accruing during the period from April 6, 1917, to date of this agreement. Any such bills, claims, or accounts that may hereafter arise or develop for such services during said period on the part of either party to this agreement shall be considered to have been included in this agreement and to have been settled in the payment herein provided for.

ARTICLE III.

PAYMENT.

Payment of the agreed sum of $32,577,858.57 will be made through the proper department of the United States Government, together with interest at 5 per cent per annum from March 1, 1921, to the date of payment to the authorized representative of the British Government. The date of the delivery of check or other means of payment by the representative of the Government of the United States of America in Washington, D. C., will be considered the date of payment.

ARTICLE IV.

EXCEPTION.

Nothing in this agreement shall be construed to refer to or to affect, in any way any claim against the United States Government by the British Government, either direct or through the Reparation Commission, in connection with reconditioning of surrendered ex-German passenger vessels taken over after the armistice and allocated to the transportation of American troops.

ARTICLE V.

INTEREST PAYMENT NOT TO BE A PRECEDENT.

The allowance of interest in this settlement is based on the specific wording of the Reading-Hines agreement and will not affect any agreement at present existing between the United States of America and His Britannic Majesty's Government.

In witness whereof on the day and year first above written this agreement had been executed in four parts, each having the full force and effect of the original by the War Department of the United States of America, acting through Brig. Gen. W. D. Connor, special representative of the Secretary of War, and by His Britannic Majesty's Government, acting through the ministry of shipping, by Sir E. Manifold Raeburn, special representative.

W. D. C.

Mr. JOHNSON. I think there is no proposition of law that is better established than that interest may offset interest in accounts between various litigants or differing individuals. It may be that under some unfortunate agreement we could not offset our interest against the interest due to Great Britain; but certainly when during the very period that Britain could not and did not pay us interest we were paying Britain some millions of dollars of interest, and this during the past year, it can not be said that the United States has acted in any harsh manner or in any Shylock fashion toward Great Britain or any other country respecting these loans.

Mr. President, there is in this bill a very, very grave principle at stake. This bill abrogates the function of the Congress of the United States. This measure in advance, not as to every detail but only as to some, prescribes how this indebtedness shall be settled. This enactment ties the hands of Congress in advance of any settlement. We give plenary power to a commission to be appointed by the President and permit that commission under the terms of the bill, which are not complete or full as to detail at all, to do as it sees fit; and then, when it shall have acted, its action is final and can not be questioned.

I can not believe, first, that that is the fashion in which the legislative branch of the Government ever was designed to act. I can not believe, next, Mr. President, that this branch of the Government ever ought to act in that fashion. From time immemorial the control of the purse strings of a nation has been the absolute domination of that nation. The long story of Anglo-Saxon emancipation demonstrates that finally it came when just the Commons took charge of the finances of the country. The long historical story, so interesting in our Anglo-Saxon brethren across the waters, the long tale of liberty finally all hinged around just one thing, the ever pressing necessity for those who represented the nation always to control its finances and never to lose a hold upon the purse strings of the country.

This, you may say, does not deal with our purse strings. Oh, Mr. President, it deals in very great degree with the very fundamental finances of our Republic. This money that was loaned was taken from our people during the stress of war, taken from them sometimes when they could very ill afford to do what was demanded of them. I know men who have gone almost to financial ruin because they responded to the patriotic call that was made upon them during the war to purchase Liberty bonds. You know men who took their precious possessions to their local banks and pledged those possessions there that they might purchase of the Liberty bonds of this country and that our country might thereafter be successful in the war. You know and I know that men who made these sacrifices in our country have been forced to sell their bonds very much below par.

You are dealing to-day with the sacrifices you then demanded, with the sacrifices that you then compelled. You are dealing to-day in this bill with the money which you wrung from the people of the country in the time of its stress, and in dealing with it you are representatives, after all, of the people of the Nation. I recognize that our old system of checks and balances is tottering to-day. I recognize that the encroachments of some years since of the one branch of the Government upon the legislative branch of the Government has insensibly continued until the legislative branch of the Government of this Nation amounts to little or to naught, and when the legislative branch of this Government surrenders its last prerogative, when the legislative branch of this Government finally, as the representative of the people of the country, turns over the right to determine a settlement made of the money wrung from the people of the Nation, there is almost an end to any legislative independence or any legislative authority.

It is because of the principle upon which I insist that I would have this Congress finally determine what ought to be done. Who should determine it? I trust the President as even my friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] would trust him. I lay no stress upon a commission to be appointed by him. I would be as willing to have the bill leave with him the power as to leave the power with a commission to be appointed by him. The commission does not appeal to me as in any degree solving the question that we ought to have the courage to solve upon a measures of this sort; but, trusting him as I do, as you do, and as all the Senate does unquestionably, is apart from the principle which is involved here.

After all, what is the Nation? That Nation is its people. What is the sovereign power in the Nation? It ought to be the people acting through their representatives. When the representatives of the people, intrusted as they are with the administration of the finances, turn that administration over to a commission or to any power within the Nation, then the sovereignty of the Nation, as we understand it, is gone and the representatives of the Nation have abandoned and abdicated their powers. I would keep the power, therefore, in the hands of our people through their representatives. What harm can it do? Why, who has the right to know what is to be done with this $10,000,000,000? A commission of Cabinet officers, you say? All excellent men, no doubt, but they are not the ones finally to determine the fact and finally to close the agreement. Here in the Senate is the power, and behind us the power is with those who send us here. If you permit a commission to determine what shall be done with this $10,000,000,000, it is all done before your people know a single thing about it. That is not republican government; that is not popular government. Before there is a consummation of what might be done with this $10,000,000,000, our people are entitled to know of it and act upon it.

We have a new era to-day—that is, we hoped we had a new era. I sat in the conference at the opening of this disarmament gathering on the first day of the session. Like every American, I felt a real thrill when the Secretary of State rose and, in the fashion that he did, in the open scrapped the old diplomacy and told there to the peoples of the world the new method and what America would do. I believe if he had continued in the open for another week there would have been a disarmament program adopted that would have been in accordance with exactly what he proposed.

I believe, Mr. President, that peoples are entitled to know what Governments are doing, that after all they foot the bills, they pay the price, and they are entitled to know what those who for a brief period are their servants contemplate either with their lives or with their resources. It is because of that principle that I would insist, had I the power, that before there be a consummation of any arrangement with $10,000,000,000 with a foreign nation, or any number of foreign nations, that arrangement our people should know.

What was it that acted upon the disarmament conference after the first day? Why, it was the opinion of the world. The peoples of the world rose to Mr. Hughes when he made his first statement of disarmament, and the peoples of every nation on the face of the earth, if they could have operated with their righteous public sentiment upon their representatives, would have compelled an acceptance of his proposal in three or four very brief, open sessions.

We were laughed at six months ago when some of us were demanding open sessions of this conference. What has the conference demonstrated? It has demonstrated that when in the open, where peoples can look on and see and hear and know, there justice was done and there was done that which peoples require, what peoples demand. When you get behind the locked door, when in secrecy you endeavor to deal with peoples, their persons, their property, or their treasure, it is then that sinister things come from gatherings which are international in character, and only then.

Do you not remember, Mr. President, how it was asserted that you could not in the open hold a conference, because, they said to us, you can not in a circus tent or in town meeting do these things? Ah, Mr. President, the big things were all done in the open. Mr. Hughes made in the open his initial start to which the world responded. Immediately Mr. Balfour wanted to state the position of Great Britain—how? In the open and in a plenary session. Then Mr. Briand desired that the position of France should be made known to the world, and he demanded an open session in order that he might present that position. Why? Why? Because, Mr. President, we are approaching a new era, the era where public opinion operates upon those who govern. The people finally are beginning to understand, not alone that they must bear burdens, but they are beginning to understand that they have rights, and that those rights are superior to the right of any representative of theirs in secrecy to deal with them. Wherever public opinion has had the opportunity to exercise itself and be operative upon a gathering such as that which has been here, out of that gathering has finally come something of worth and something of value, something of amelioration to the peoples themselves.

So it was that some months ago we demanded open sessions of the conference. Mr. President, the events have justified not only the demand but the men who made the demand at that time. Of all the things in the world there is one thing after all that touches every man. There is one thing finally, Mr. President, that all of us are agreed upon. No man would have armed conflict, none would have war. All with practical unanimity would desire disarmament. The only proposition that is presented by conferences such as that here to-day is whether we have in addition something unrelated and unconnected with disarmament.

With some there is a singular psychological condition now. Through one stage of hysteria we went a couple of years ago with the League of Nations. I do not want another period of hysteria such as that. I can remember how men, with their eyes starting from their heads, would rush up to us and hysterically say, "Do you not believe in stopping wars?" And we would timidly respond, "Of course we do." Then the reply would be, as they shook their fists in our faces, "Then you must be for the League of Nations." To-day I find something of that same sentiment, some of the same people hysterically saying, "Do you not believe in disarmament?" And as we dodge their blows we timidly admit, "Of course we are for disarmament." Then with a vociferous burst they say, "You must be for the new quadruple alliance." I am unable to see wholly the exact connection, but whether it be of one sort or another, we leave to future discussion; and what may be our attitude in that regard, of course, will be made perfectly plain, so far as the Senate is concerned, in the days that are to come.

I have gone far, perhaps, from the subject that is before us this morning. I have strayed because, after all, inextricably commingled is a principle to which I am pointing in these remarks and to which in random fashion I have referred. I recall some discussion the other day when the bill was presented of selling these bonds that may be taken from the foreign nations. Aptly and correctly the chairman of the Finance Committee said that it was not involved in the bill and authority under the bill has not been accorded. But let me issue just a warning here.

There is a vast difference, my friends, between an obligation due to a government and that obligation split into infinitesimal parts and put into the hands of the people of that government. There is a vast difference, and if you want a concrete illustration look at France to-day. In the hands of all its people are the bonds of Russia. Every mad adventure in Russia is embraced by France because of the public opinion behind it, a public opinion caused by the bonds of the Russian government in the pockets of the people of France. If you want to be inextricably mixed with every controversy in Europe, if you want the basest appeal that can be made to your own people, effective, too, no matter how ignoble, take the bonds of these foreign Governments that are owing us debts and get them into the hands of our people to the extent of $10,000,000,000. Do that, and you will not require a League of Nations to be mixed in every brawl, every controversy, every war, and every difficulty abroad.

I sound that alarm as a warning upon this proposition, because it was adverted to the other day. I recognize it has no part in the discussion, as the chairman of the Finance Committee said in speaking concerning it, but because it was adverted to before I advert to it now.

Remember, I beg you, the long, long struggle in Britain. Remember 1215, when the first charter was wrung from an English King. Recall how during the succeeding 400 years Britain was ever engaged in struggle, ever engaged in the struggle for her people through their representatives to control every financial movement of the realm. Remember how the casuists during Charles's time endeavored to draw the distinction between a tax and a loan. Remember how the Commons stood their ground, and remember that out of it all finally came what is immutable there, what should be immutable here, the right of the nation, through its representatives, ever to oversee, ever to control, every financial arrangement.

Remember the beginnings of our early struggles. You require no Necker, with his four volumes upon Finance in France, to demonstrate his theme. You require no Patrick Henry's declaration. You need no Virginia legislative decree concerning our attitude toward that which would be taken from us. You need naught but your own experience here. To-day you are called upon to deal with a money wrung in greater sum than ever before in the history of the world from your peoples. You are called upon to-day to deal with that which in the last analysis is theirs and of which you are but the trustees for a brief period upon this floor.

Remembering that, let us be faithful to our trusteeship. Give power if you wish—I would not, if I had the entire say in the matter, give such power as is here accorded—give it if you wish; but, after all, retain your right, the right that is the right of the people who sent you here; retain the right to say whether a settlement that is made of $10,000,000,000 of your people's money shall be final, require that it shall be reported to you for approval before it is consummated.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have listened, as I always do, with very great interest, and, in fact, fascination, to the eloquence of my honored and esteemed friend from California, and with very much of it I agree. In his announcement of the theoretical and ideal he has stated truths in which we all concur and which we regard as fundamental in our Nation's life and our Nation's history. I only wish that I could see the connection between these beautiful announcements of truth and the question at hand.

In the first place, let me say to my friend that the Secretary of the Treasury already has full authority under existing law, without coming to this body for the enactment of another word, to fund the entire indebtedness owing to us from other peoples. The Secretary of the Treasury need not have come to this body for a word of additional authority; he already had the power. The only object in coming to Congress was, first, to have Congress back up the authority he already had, or, in a sense, reaffirm it; and, in the next place, to secure authority from Congress to fund the accrued interest and to fund the amount due this Nation from the sale of materials by the War Department, by the Navy Department, by the United States Grain Corporation, and the American Relief Administration. The $9,434,000,000 plus which we actually loaned to the foreign Governments, however, the Secretary of the Treasury, without another word of legislation, has full authority to fund.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. What reply has the Senator from Indiana to make to the proposition submitted by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] a few moments ago, that the obligations now in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury contain an agreement by the various foreign nations to permit the accrued interest to be refunded? Why can not the interest be refunded under that agreement?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Because the law states differently, I will say to my friend from Tennessee. I am not going to take the time to look it up, but the law states differently. Even if it did not, the present Secretary of the Treasury says that, in his judgment, he has no right to fund the accrued interest, and he declines to enter upon any sort of an arrangement to fund that accrued interest, because, he says, he lacks the authority to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much gratified with what the Senator from Indiana has just said about the present authority of the Secretary of the Treasury. Really all the Secretary needs to complete the entire transaction is authority to deal with the accrued interest and with the other debts to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Precisely.

Mr. NORRIS. While I think the Secretary of the Treasury has authority to deal with the accrued interest now—I shall not be captious about that—I am perfectly willing to give him that authority. Why, then, should we go any further in this legislation than merely to give him the same authority to deal with the accrued interest and the other debts that he already has to deal with the money actually loaned? Why not stop there?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will answer that question. This proposed legislation is necessary simply because the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury desire to be backed up by the authority of Congress in funding these debts.

Mr. NORRIS. But would it not back them up if we did what I have suggested?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; because that suggestion contemplates no reference whatever to the great indebtedness which is owing us by other peoples, represented by the accrued interest and the miscellaneous debts to which I have already referred.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator mean as to the debts which the Secretary has authority to fund now?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the President would like to have the law reenacted, why not merely say, "We hereby reenact the previous law and give you all the powers that you already have"?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is practically what this bill proposes to do.

Mr. NORRIS. I am afraid that is not what the bill proposes to do. The only thing that bothers me about the bill is that I think it goes a great deal further than that.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is very different, indeed, from that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not think so; that is to say, except as to the other powers which are essential to carrying into full execution the task to be consummated.

I agree with my honored friend from California that we ought not to have paid interest to Great Britain while Great Britain owed us so much, but the Secretary of the Treasury has explicitly said—and he is entirely right because he shows the documents to prove his statement—that he had no power to do otherwise under an agreement previously made before he came into the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. I know that my friend would not have had him dishonor the obligations which had been entered into with Great Britain by a previous administration at the time the obligation was made. Therefore the Secretary of the Treasury could do nothing under the obligation which existed when he came into the Treasury Department but pay Great Britain that interest.

In the next place, I want to say to my friend from California that, in my humble judgment, it is not the function of a legislative body to collect a debt or to arrange to collect a debt. What is the practical business reason for that statement? Mr. President, while we were loaning $9,000,000,000 plus to those who were associated with us in the World War, Great Britain was loaning a corresponding sum to her associates in that war; so that to-day, while France owes us $2,000,000,000, she likewise owes Great Britain more than $2,000,000,000; she also owes Italy. Czechoslovakia owes France, and she owes Great Britain. Jugoslavia owes France and owes Great Britain, and the smaller nations all owe one another. Italy owes Great Britain and she also owes France. Therefore there must be some authority somewhere to sit down and compose all of these differences and reduce them to a succinct form before anything can be done toward collecting the debts. So, when we strip it of all verbiage, all in the world we are proposing to do here is simply to confer upon a commission, which is to be appointed by the President of the United States, the power to fund the accrued interest and the money which is owing us from the sale of supplies by the War Department, the Navy Department, the Grain Corporation, and the American Relief Administration. That is all there is to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator another question. It is true, is it not, that the identical amount of every one of these debts is already ascertained and determined?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; the amount has been ascertained and determined; but I will say to my friend from Nebraska this is the question: Can we force France, for instance, to pay what she owes us without any regard to what she owes Great Britain? At the same time, can we compel Great Britain to pay us what she owes us without any regard to whether she gets any amount of money from France, which owes her, or from Italy, which owes her, or from Poland, which owes her, or from Russia, which owes her, or from Czechoslovakia, which owes her?

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Indiana propound that as a question to me?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator wishes me to answer the question, I will say that in collecting our debt from Great Britain I do not believe it is a part of our business to have anything to say or to try to have anything to say as to what Great Britain shall do with regard to what Czechoslovakia owes her.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is quite true; but when we sit down with these nations and undertake to compose our differences with them we are bound to take into consideration their financial condition.

It has been said here that we should insist on a clause being incorporated in this measure to compel the debtor nations to pay us interest semiannually. How in the world could that be done? The Secretary of the Treasury has said to us, after a full investigation of the situation, and after a survey of the field, that if we were to put such a clause into the bill he could not get bonds from those nations, because they would decline to enter into obligations of that character; that they simply could not pay us the interest semiannually.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Indiana permit another interruption?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it that the Senator from Indiana is in entire accord with my theory that we have not any right, neither has any borrowing nation any right, without our consent, any more than we have the right without their consent, to change the contract that was made, by virtue of our Liberty loan acts, when those nations actually borrowed the money?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if those nations agreed at that time to pay us the interest semiannually——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Which they did not.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, if they did not, then they are not bound to do so, but if they did, they are bound to do so. Whatever contract was made at that time they are bound by unless they both agree to a different contract.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Precisely; but they did not agree to pay us semiannual interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Then they are not bound to do so.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; but a great many want a provision written into the terms of this bill that they shall be compelled to pay semiannual interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. They did agree to pay interest annually, did they not?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; they did not.

Mr. BORAH. Did they not agree to pay any interest at all?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. They did not.

Mr. BORAH. Then the interest would be collectible whenever it fell due, would it not?

Mr. NORRIS. It never would be due according to that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. These obligations are demand obligations, I will say to the Senator from Idaho; they are payable on demand; but——

Mr. BORAH. Exactly, and the interest is due every day.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The interest is due any day.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; as a matter of fact all of these nations are now in default of their interest.

Mr. BORAH. They are in default, and they will be in no worse default in their interest if we put it in the bond that they shall pay the interest semiannually.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly they will be no more in default, I will say to the Senator, but this is the situation: At the present time it is understood that the debtor nations are under no obligation to pay us—that word has been sent abroad—until this debt shall have been reduced to the form of bonds. That is understood in all the chancelleries of Europe, and there is no effort being made on the part of any European government to pay us at this time.

It is worth while considering, I want to say to the Senator, when our commission sit down, as they will if they shall be appointed, with representatives of other nations of the world and undertake to compose these differences, what are they going to do? Are they going to look at the question as if Great Britain alone owes us this money? They can not do that; they must take into consideration Great Britain's financial condition and her ability to pay and to meet her obligations; and, in order to do that, they must know how much France can pay Great Britain; how much France is going to pay us; how much Italy can pay France, and how much Italy can pay Great Britain. All of these things must be definitely known, notwithstanding the strict terms of the contract heretofore made.

Mr. President, suppose we were to write into this bond a requirement for the payment of 5 per cent interest semiannually; in the first place, we could not get the bonds—there is nothing more certain than that—and, in the next place, we could not get the debtor nations to enter into an arrangement to pay us 5 per cent interest if it is to be paid semiannually.

Where do we stand in regard to the whole question? In the first place the Secretary of the Treasury says that he intends, so far as is humanly possible, to collect 5 per cent interest, and that 5 per cent interest is the rate that should be collected. That is because our bonds bear 4¼ per cent; and, secondly, because they are nontaxable, which of course indirectly makes the rate higher; and, in the third place, because of what it cost us to sell the bonds and to incur the obligations. Therefore, he thinks that 5 per cent is a legitimate rate of interest. That being true, and the Secretary of the Treasury, who is to be at the head of the proposed commission, asserting with all confidence and sincerity that he intends to attempt to collect 5 per cent interest, why should we attempt to write it into the bond that it will be thus collected and collected semiannually?

Mr. BORAH. I think we should write it into the bond because I believe that is where it should be written. The responsibility is upon us; we can not delegate this power and escape the responsibility which rests upon us of settling this debt in a proper way. I agree with the Senator perfectly that the actual negotiations ought to be carried on by an agent, by an individual, or by a commission, and I would just as soon leave it to Mr. Mellon as to leave it to Mr. Mellon and his four associates. It is not because I have any objection to Mr. Mellon——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no; we understand that.

Mr. BORAH. That I want anybody associated with him, because I think in any event he will conduct the negotiations himself, and his associates will simply be company. But the responsibility is upon us, and we have got to report back to those whose money we appropriated, by which appropriation we created this debt.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But the Senator forgets that already, by the very power by which the money was appropriated and in the very body of the act, we conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury the right to fund all the debts. That has already passed; that is settled and over.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that to be true, but we are now taking it up for some reason which I confess I can not quite understand, and reaffirming——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let me interrupt the Senator right there to say that, instead of snatching this question away from the legislative body, as my friend from California would have us believe, instead of taking away from us something that really belongs to us, the President of the United States has come here, when there was no necessity for his coming here, in order to secure authority to do something that he already has the authority to do.

Mr. BORAH. Yes. If the President would continue that habit, I would have no quarrel with him at all. I am not so anxious to have the President come here at a time when he does not need to come as I am to have him come here when I think he ought to come.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is aside from the question.

Mr. BORAH. So that when the negotiations have been concluded those who appropriated this money shall be called upon to indorse the result which has been reached.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Suppose we should undertake to do that, then in what condition would the commission be? In the first place, it is quite manifest that Great Britain will at once enter into negotiations. I have not any doubt in the world, and neither has the Secretary of the Treasury, that Great Britain will promptly pay her obligations, and that she will pay her interest semiannually, because we are told that she will probably be in a position to do that. Now, suppose that negotiations are concluded with Great Britain, and then a report is made to Congress on that proposition, but that we are not able to make the same terms with France, and we can not make the same terms with Italy that we make with France, and we can not make the same terms with Poland that we make with Italy, and we can not make the same terms with Russia that we make with Poland, what are we going to do?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Indiana does not believe that there will be any contract closed upon this question with any chancellor in Europe that will not be known to every other chancellor the next day? No contract will be closed in this matter; no debt will be settled the details of which will be the exclusive secret of the two nations which settle it. It is absolutely out of the question for any such thing to take place.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not any doubt about that, and I have made no such assertion.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says there must be an element of secrecy in this proposition.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, I have not said that; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BORAH. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am simply saying that we are in the exact position, if my friend please, of a bank which has a number of insolvent and half-insolvent debtors. The banker goes out and deals with each one of them and endeavors to find out the financial condition of the man he is dealing with. He does not treat them all alike. He does not go out and drag one man in and say, "I will give you so much time to pay, and you have got to enter into a new obligation to pay your interest regularly and to pay a certain amount of the principal." No; he does the very best he can with that man. So, if I had my way about it—and, of course, I have no authority—I would be very happy right now to take 50 cents on the dollar for all the money which is owing us from Czechoslovakia and other smaller nations which, in my judgment, never will be able to pay, or, at least, not in the Senator's day or mine.

Mr. BORAH. No; not in the Senator's day or mine.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But that is entirely apart from the question. There is in the express terms of this bill the statement that no dollar of it shall ever be canceled. Every penny of it is to be collected. No penny of it is to be remitted to any nation, for any purpose.

Mr. BORAH. I understand.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does not that satisfy the Senator?

Mr. BORAH. It satisfies me so far as the law is concerned, but I want to say to the Senator that there is not a chancellery in Europe that believes that this debt will ever be paid.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. BORAH. Why, Mr. President, the proposition has been boldly put up to the United States through official channels to cancel this debt upon the part of the Nation best able to pay.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. France?

Mr. BORAH. Great Britain.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I do not think so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why Mr. President, here——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the cancellation proposition came from Great Britain.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, I understand. I have read all that correspondence. I know all about it. One man put it up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Representing Lloyd-George.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But the Senator from North Carolina well knows that that came at a time when President Wilson had his special representative over there, a man by the name of Rathbone, for the purpose of making some sort of arrangement for the refunding of this debt. That is when that came; and at that time the Englishman, and I think very shrewdly from his standpoint, put it up to us to cancel the debt, or to forgive at least a portion of it. I have read all that correspondence; I am perfectly familiar with it; but that has not anything to do with our position on the question.

We are determined that that money shall be collected. We are determined that every dollar of it shall be paid. We are determined that not one penny of it shall ever be remitted to any nation. Is not that satisfactory?—and the Secretary of the Treasury, sitting in the presence of the Finance Committee, over and over again reiterated the statement that no dollar of it should be remitted by his consent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask the Senator from Indiana, when the Finance Committee were considering the Senate bill, which gives the Secretary unlimited power, why did he then object to a provision against cancellation and against interest extension?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Solely because it is an administrative and not a legislative function to collect a debt, or to set up the machinery by which a debt may be collected; and I think if the amendment of my friend from California [Mr. JOHNSON] were adopted and written into this bill, it would be nothing more nor less than a square vote of a lack of confidence in the President of the United States and such commission as he might appoint to do the thing that is herein described.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator ought to say that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course I mean nothing personal to my friend from California, and certainly it was furthest from his intention to ask for an amendment that does vote a lack of confidence; but that is my construction of it.

Mr. BORAH. No; upon reflection the Senator will not believe that. The Congress of the United States is the only power which could have appropriated this money.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. We did appropriate it. We were the people who took it out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country and sent it abroad. Our duty and our responsibility never ceases in connection with that until we ourselves, in the exercise of our best judgment, have confirmed the method by which it comes back to us. The President of the United States did not appropriate this money. He could not appropriate it. He is not responsible for it. We are simply doing that which Congress is so apt to do when we find a difficult task, namely, to find some one else upon whom to devolve the responsibility, and we are pushing it on to a commission. That commission is not elected by the people. It is not selected by the people. We are, and we will report back to them, and we ought to report a contract which we can stand by.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The all-sufficient answer to that is that by the very terms of the law which enabled the Secretary of the Treasury to issue these bonds in the beginning we conferred upon him the power to collect the debt. That is already done, and the Senator was a part of that. He himself voted, doubtless, for that act.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. GLASS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to my friend from California, and then to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I was simply going to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that two different times are involved. None of us would stop to question legality, constitutionality, or anything else during the war when things were necessary to be done. There is not any such situation to-day. To-day we ought to be moving in the usual course of legislative activity, and to-day it is our duty to scrutinize and to do those things which we might even have forgotten to do or eliminated during the time of stress and the time of war.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My reply to that is that the world to-day financially is just as chaotic as it was during the time of war, that we are dealing with a great many nations that are either wholly bankrupt or partially so, and that all in the world we are seeking to do by this measure is simply to set up the machinery to fund a debt that everybody admits is owing us and that nobody is seeking to escape. That seems like a very simple proposition. If we did not have any confidence in the President of the United States, and if we did not have a law which prescribes what shall be done and how it shall be done, it would be an entirely different thing; but already we have conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury the power to collect practically all of this debt, and he comes here simply asking for authority to fund a fragment of it that is not included in existing law.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let me yield to the Senator from Virginia first, and then I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. GLASS. What the Senator from Indiana says is partially true. Under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to fund this indebtedness, but he is authorized to fund it upon well-defined terms and for specifically defined periods. That being so, I have wondered why we should set up an expensive commission to do what the Secretary of the Treasury is already authorized to do upon specific terms. He is authorized to fund this demand indebtedness approximating $10,000,000,000 into long-time obligations of these respective nations upon interest terms set out in the act and for periods mentioned in the act. Therefore, in my judgment, there is no need of any commission to do what the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to do. There is a miscellaneous indebtedness arising out of Mr. Hoover's activities—chips and whetstones which we never will collect, anyhow—that perhaps the Secretary of the Treasury requires authority to fund. It will be, in my judgment, an idle process; but he does not need any additional authority to fund this major indebtedness.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let me ask the Senator from Virginia a question before he takes his seat, please. Has not the Senator contended that the Secretary of the Treasury also has the power to fund the accrued interest?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; I think so; and that was never denied by the Finance Committee of the Senate or the Ways and Means Committee of the House. I brought that matter sharply to the attention of the late Mr. Penrose and of the present chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, suggesting that if they had any doubt of the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to do that, I should like to have them express it and indicate what it was; and they both agreed that there was no doubt.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am very glad to have the opinion of the very able Senator from Virginia, former Secretary of the Treasury, on that question, though I differ with him as to the authority to fund the interest. But, be that as it may, whatever my individual opinion may be, the present Secretary of the Treasury squarely asserts that he has no such authority and would not undertake to exercise it without additional legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. No authority to do what?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. To fund the accrued interest.

Mr. SIMMONS. Possibly the Secretary has not; I do not pretend to say as to that; but the Senator a little while ago stated very emphatically, as I understood him, that there was nothing in the law requiring the semiannual payment of interest.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. The existing law. Probably the Senator is correct when he uses the words "semiannual interest"; but does the Senator deny that under the existing law there is authority for the Secretary, and that that authority is mandatory, to require the annual payment of the interest?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention——

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have the Senator from Indiana answer this question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. What was the Senator's question? Mr. Walker was talking to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator left the impression a few moments ago that there was nothing in the present law fixing the time of the payment of interest.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The law simply provides that it shall be a certain rate per annum. Here it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator said a while ago that there was no authority granted the Secretary in the present law to require this interest to be paid semiannually. I wanted to know if the Senator was simply asserting that while there might be an authority to demand that it be paid annually, there was none to require him to demand that it be paid semiannually?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is my understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that if that is his position, technically he is correct. There is nothing in the present law that requires the Secretary of the Treasury to demand that this interest be paid semiannually. My amendment provides for the semiannual payment of interest, but the Senator understands that in the Senate Committee on Finance, as originally drafted, it was "annually"; and I do not think it is at all material whether my amendment says "semiannually" or "annually." I am perfectly willing to make it "annually." The truth is, if the Senator will pardon me, that the Liberty bond act provides first, if the Senator will permit me to read it——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am reading from the Liberty bond act, Mr. President:

> The bonds herein authorized shall be in such form and subject to such terms and conditions of issue, conversion, redemption, maturities, payment, and rate and time of payment of interest, not exceeding 3½ per cent per annum, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

That is the rate of interest that the Secretary of the Treasury was required to fix in the Liberty bonds.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, that was the time of payment—that the interest was to be paid annually.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The first Liberty bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now let me read the next section.

> SEC. 2. That for purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase, at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials—> the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

And interest, of course, is an essential—

Therefore the bonds which this law requires the Secretary of the Treasury to take from foreign Governments must contain not less than the rate of interest prescribed for the Liberty bonds; and while the amount of that rate of interest is left to the President, the time of the payment of that interest is fixed and determined, and it is payable annually. If the Senator makes any point against my amendment or against the fight that has been made here because we have been contending for the semiannual payment, I am perfectly willing to change the amendment and let it conform strictly and technically to the terms of the Liberty bond act.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The certificates of indebtedness taken by our Government, which our Government now holds, representing this indebtedness, read in part as follows:

> The Government of ———, for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of ——— on demand, with interest from the date hereof, at the rate of — per cent per annum.

That is to say, the interest is payable per annum. I do not think there is any dispute about that; but the representative of the President, Mr. Rathbone, when he was abroad, entered into certain conversations with the Governments of England and of France.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me before he gets to that——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I understand that the Senator admits that if the Secretary of the Treasury were undertaking to adjust this foreign indebtedness upon the basis of the existing law, he would be required by that law to demand a bond the interest upon which should be payable annually.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is my understanding.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that the Secretary now insists—that is the gravamen of his whole contention—that he should be given power to change that feature of the present law, and to extend the time of the payment of interest upon these foreign bonds which he is to take as long as he may see fit and may think the conditions of those Governments require that he should extend it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. This is purely a certificate that I read to the Senator. It is not a law.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand; I am not talking about the certificate at all. I am talking about the Liberty bond act, from which the Secretary derives his sole authority as it now exists to deal with these bonds; and I have understood the Senator as admitting that under the present law the Secretary will be bound to require of all foreign Governments that their bonds covering this indebtedness to us shall bear a certain rate of interest, not less than that of the Liberty bonds which we issued, and that that rate of interest shall be payable annually.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I correct the Senator right there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. The provision of the Liberty loan act under which the loans were made provided specifically that the interest to be paid by the foreign Governments should be the same interest that our bonds should bear, and that if those bonds should be changed for bonds bearing a higher rate the interest should be at the higher rate, and, in addition to that, that the interest should be paid at the same time; in other words, in the same manner and form and conforming to our own bonds; and our own Liberty bonds are payable semiannually. Therefore, notwithstanding what is written into these I O U's——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly my contention.

Mr. McCUMBER. While the interest on them is payable only semiannually, whenever we settle the matter with the foreign Government, we will have to ask them to give a bond the interest of which shall be paid semiannually in accordance with the terms of our own bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. That has been my contention——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It is not my contention.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the Senator from North Dakota was perhaps out of the Chamber when the Senator from Indiana asserted early in his speech that there was no requirement in the law that the interest upon these bonds should be paid semiannually.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not, nor have I at any time, had the view of the situation described by the Senator from North Carolina and even by the chairman of the committee. The Secretary of the Treasury squarely said, as the Senator will recall, that if we were compelled to make this interest payable semiannually he doubted whether we could get them to give the bonds, and, furthermore, that we would be doing a vain thing because of the fact that we knew in advance they could not pay the interest semiannually.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is not the point I am discussing now.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I understand what the Senator is discussing.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator probably said it inadvertently, but he did declare early in his speech that there was nothing in the present law that required the payment of the interest on these bonds semiannually. I insist that if there is nothing in the law requiring it to be paid semiannually there is in the present law an express and explicit requirement that it shall be paid annually. I think it was subsequently changed to semiannually.

Now, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We have had so much of discussion before the committee on the question from time to time that we have not all agreed about many of the provisions, but the Senator will remember that, notwithstanding these assertions and notwithstanding these express provisions written into the agreement and into our laws, for that matter, an arrangement was entered into by which the interest was to be postponed for two or three years.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not dealing with that at all, and I do not say that that was justified. I am afraid it was not.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But it was done.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was done, and we are acquiescing in it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; we are acquiescing in it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was done just at the close of the war under stress, but we are acquiescing in it. But when we come to settle these bonds finally, then we ought to settle them according to the law or according to the will of the people if they want to change the law. The reason why I am making a point about this matter is that the essential controversy here grows out of the demand of the Secretary of the Treasury that he be allowed to postpone the payment of interest on these bonds at will, the Secretary having said before the Committee on Finance that in some cases probably he would have to extend the time one or two or three years further, and possibly in some cases he might find it expedient to extend it for 10 years.

The question here is, Do we want to give the Secretary that authority? The Senator, as I understood him, stated that there was nothing in the present law requiring this interest to be paid semiannually. I say the Senator is mistaken in that. The present law does require the Secretary to take bonds with interest payable annually or semiannually, as the case may be. I think in one act it is annually and in the other, possibly, semiannually.

What the Secretary is asking and what I am resisting, and that is the gravamen of this contention, is that the Secretary shall be given authority to change the terms of the law with reference to the time of payment of the interest, unless Congress shall hereafter agree to his settlement.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I wish to make one observation at this point. When the Senator from North Carolina first rose in his place to respond to the statement I made about semiannual payment of interest, he stated that if I said the interest was not payable semiannually I was technically correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think so.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But he thought it was payable annually.

Mr. SIMMONS. So far as the provisions of the Liberty bond acts are concerned, that is right. There are two of those Liberty bond acts.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We objected, as the Senator will remember, to putting in a provision that the interest should be paid semiannually because the Secretary of the Treasury said, first, he probably could not get the bonds if we did; and, secondly, if we wrote that into the bonds most of those nations would not be able to pay their interest charge at the end of the first six months and would be in default. He further went on to say, as the Senator will recall, that if France gave us an obligation, even if she went far enough to give the obligation, the interest of which was payable in six months, and France defaulted when the first interest payment became due, then she would stand as a defaulter in the eyes of the world and her credit would be very greatly injured among the nations of the earth. The Senator recalls all of that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, yes; I recall that, and I recall the further fact that France and all these debtors are in default now. They were in default before the time the extension was granted, and under the law they are in default now.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not agree with the Senator's contention that those nations are in default now. They are not in default, because we have never agreed upon the specific terms of the obligation they owe us, and they will not be in default in reality until the bonds are given and until it is nominated squarely in the bonds the rate of interest and time of payment.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, we have been in agreement, and nearly every one of those nations has paid at one time or another a part of the interest charge. Great Britain has paid more than any of the rest of them. Great Britain has already paid us large sums in interest. So has France. Italy has also paid us a considerable sum of interest. Even Belgium has paid us some interest.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Why has she not paid more?

Mr. SIMMONS. I assume that when Belgium, France, Italy, and Great Britain paid the amounts we have received from them, they paid it at the rate fixed in the law authorizing these loans——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. The rate of interest that was fixed in that law was as much a part of the contract between this Government and our foreign debtor nations as if it had been written in express language in the contract.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no; those nations paid that interest at the rate of 5 per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does the Senator deny that proposition?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I deny that they paid at the rate that our bonds draw, because they paid interest at the rate of 5 per cent and not at the rate of 4¼ per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. It was provided that the interest should be not less than that, and the Treasury Department, I suppose, included the expenses. Allowing for the expenses to the United States Government for the flotation of those bonds and exercising the discretion which the law gave them, they demanded 5 per cent, and those Governments that paid the interest admitted that as a correct rate and paid the interest at that rate.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. My judgment is, I will say to the Senator, though this is quite apart from the discussion, that we had no right to collect 5 per cent interest from those people, because it was not so nominated in the bond.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But that is neither here nor there. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Unless the two Senators in discussion have more accurate information than I ever possessed, I think each is mistaken in his statement that we agreed to defer the interest for two or three years. There has never been any agreement whatsoever as to the deferment of the interest payment. It just simply has not been collected because those Governments found it extremely inconvenient, if not impossible, to pay it.

There was in the correspondence between the Treasury and the committees of Congress an implication, an implied promise, not to press the matter of deferred interest for two or three years, but there has never been any settlement of the matter. There has never been any agreement between the Governments to that effect. I have little doubt that there is any moral obligation, which is a much abused and much misused term, on the part of this Government to defer the interest payment.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. May I ask the Senator a question at that point?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do not recall, but I think Mr. Houston, who was Secretary of the Treasury at that time, succeeding the Senator from Virginia, sent abroad Mr. Rathbone.

Mr. GLASS. No; I sent Mr. Rathbone abroad.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I was not familiar with that particular detail, but at all events Mr. Rathbone went abroad for the purpose of holding conversations with representatives of foreign Governments with reference to the funding of this debt. That is true, is it not?

Mr. GLASS. It is.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Was there not—I will not call it an agreement but a tentative arrangement made between them by which the interest payment was to be deferred for two or three years, and that was communicated to the Senator as the then Secretary of the Treasury, and as Secretary of the Treasury the Senator made the statement that in some way that interest might be deferred for two or three years.

Mr. GLASS. That is true, but there was no consummation of any arrangement whatsoever. Mr. Rathbone, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of foreign loans, in his conversations abroad intimated to the representatives of the foreign Governments that this Government felt disposed not to insist upon the immediate payment of interest; but Mr. Rathbone was cut short in his negotiations when they were all but complete. Lloyd-George dismissed him and sent him back to this country. Why that was done I have never known; I could only conjecture. So that as a matter of technical fact there was never any agreement made as to deferring the interest payments.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I think perhaps the word "agreement" is too strong a word to use, but that there was an understanding, I think, there is no question.

Mr. GLASS. There was an intimation. There was an intimation that if this funding took place upon the terms of the law the Treasury might be willing to defer payment of interest, but the whole negotiation was abandoned.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Here is the language used by Secretary Houston, showing his understanding of the arrangement that had been made:

> In the early autumn of 1919 the Treasury informed the treasuries of European Governments to which it had made advances that it was prepared, in case they so desired, to discuss with them the exchange of the demand notes for long-time obligations, and in that connection the deferring of interest collections during the reconstruction period of two or three years from the spring of 1919.

Mr. GLASS. It was prepared to discuss with those nations, and the discussion was terminated by those nations; therefore no agreement was made.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I think the word "agreement" is too strong. There was no agreement, but when the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States informed the treasuries of our debtor countries that he was ready to discuss with them such an arrangement and enter into it if those nations desired, and that as a part of that agreement, or part of that intimation, as the Senator calls it, and I accept his term, a statement was made to the effect that the interest might be postponed for two or three years during the period of reconstruction, immediately those nations seized upon that as if the agreement had already been made. Then, afterwards, when Secretary Mellon came into office, he said that he accepted it as if it were an agreement, and that he would not insist on the interest being paid before the expiration of that time, because he wanted to carry out what he thought was a good-faith arrangement by his predecessors with our debtor nations.

Mr. GLASS. I am not criticizing the present Secretary of the Treasury for taking that view of the matter. I am merely saying that only this preliminary discussion was had, and that was terminated on motion of the foreign nations themselves. Right there Secretary Houston and I disagree as to the moral obligation.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of course, while I have very great respect for the views and opinions of the honorable Senator from Virginia, we were bound, at least so a majority of the committee thought, by the statement of the present Secretary and in view of the further fact that the interest had been postponed and had not been paid.

Mr. GLASS. I hope the Senator will not understand me as opposing a postponement of the interest payments.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I so understood the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; I do not at all. I did not want to have it appear in the RECORD that there had been an agreement between the Governments, because there was no agreement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I read a statement of Secretary Mellon which is found on page 167 of part 4 of the hearings? Referring to this he said:

> Secretary MELLON. I would not consider myself bound by those tentative proposals—

About which the Senator spoke—> and so forth. The only thing referred to was this statement that we informed the treasuries of the European Governments to which we had made advances that this Government was prepared to defer the interest. They have been informed that we would do so. It has gone further than merely a tentative proposal in that respect.

So the Secretary felt that it had gone so far that we were morally obligated to defer the interest, particularly because the foreign Governments had acted upon that tentative proposal.

Mr. GLASS. I repeat that I am not opposing the deferment of interest payments. I just want the record to be accurate. This Government did not say that it was prepared to defer payment; it said it was prepared to discuss the proposition of deferred payment. Suppose I should owe the Senator from Indiana $100,000, which is an inconceivable thing——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. To both of us.

Mr. GLASS. And the Senator would propose to me that he was prepared to discuss with me a deferment of the interest charge on that account and in the course of the conversation he would abruptly break off negotiations, would he think he was under any moral obligation to me then to defer that interest charge?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is altogether owing to what transpired subsequently. If I got the impression that I might postpone the payment of interest from what had been said to me and proceeded upon that theory and it was acquiesced in by my friend from Virginia, then the probabilities are that the obligation would be a moral one.

Mr. GLASS. But the Senator did not proceed at all; he broke off negotiations.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Oh, no; all the interest was not paid, and it was not paid, as I understand it, because the people abroad thought that an arrangement had been made, or at least they pretended to think so.

Mr. GLASS. It was not paid because they could not pay it. That is all there was to it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Some of them might have been able to pay it.

Mr. GLASS. Possibly.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Secretary Mellon, in a letter to Senator Penrose, said:

> In view of the action of my predecessors, I am of the opinion that as to the principal foreign Governments receiving advances from the proceeds of Liberty bonds this Government is committeed to the postponement of the interest for two or three years (over two years of which have already elapsed)—

"This Government is committed to the postponement" is the language.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think the Government is committed. So far as my vote can affect the matter, I am perfectly willing to defer the interest payment. It has been deferred almost three years now.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It is already deferred.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think we will lose much time on that score; but there was no commitment, and there was no commitment because the foreign Governments abruptly broke off the negotiations.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. And he goes on to say—> for two or three years (over two years of which have already elapsed), and to spread over subsequent years the payment of the postponed interest installments.

Mr. GLASS. I should be glad to vote for that.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, when I arose it was to make a 5-minute response to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], but the questions which have been asked have led me into many fields which I did not intend to explore. I am very glad to discuss any phase of this matter as I understand it. The truth about it is that unfortunately we have not all arrived apparently at one understanding respecting all of the intricacies and involvements of the subject. The whole proposition is simply this in my judgment: Shall we confer upon the President of the United States, the executive branch of the Government, which, I believe, alone is the one to deal with this problem, the power which is prescribed and set forth in this proposed act?

Mr. GLASS. May I ask the Senator from Indiana a question right there?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator admits that under existing law the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to fund this indebtedness?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. GLASS. Why does not the Secretary go on and fund it?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I can answer that, as I have attempted to answer it time and time again: First, because he wishes to include also the accrued interest, and he has no right to fund that accrued interest.

Mr. GLASS. The Secretary of the Treasury thinks that?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. He does, and has so stated. He differs from the honorable Senator from Virginia in that respect.

Secondly, as he construes the law he has no power whatever to fund the indebtedness owing to us by reason of the sales of materials by the War Department, by the Navy Department, by the United States Grain Corporation, and by the Relief Administration. Does the Senator from Virginia think that the Secretary has the power to fund that indebtedness?

Mr. GLASS. No; and I do not think we shall ever collect any of that indebtedness; but the Secretary of the Treasury now has power under the law to fund the nearly $10,000,000,000 of major indebtedness of foreign nations, and I am more than astonished to hear the Senator from Indiana say that the present Secretary of the Treasury does not agree with that interpretation of the law.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. He does not, and he explicitly stated that if there was no legislative enactment he would not undertake to fund that indebtedness, because he thought he did not have the power to do so or the authority to attempt to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator from North Carolina permit me to conclude?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have an engagement and I wish to get away, unless there is some question of importance the Senator wishes to ask.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; go ahead; I will wait until the Senator concludes his answer, and then I will ask him a question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Therefore, the question is, Can not Congress establish a method for the funding of a debt which everybody admits is owing us? We have been six months engaged in this enterprise. We had hearing after hearing in the Finance Committee. We had the Secretary of the Treasury and his aides and assistants there time and time again endeavoring to arrive at some conclusion. As I said the other day to the Senator from North Carolina, in answering a question as to why we had not proceeded in some form or other, it was simply with the desire of avoiding discussion that might be unseemly while the representatives of foreign Governments were in our city as guests of the Nation. We did not want that kind of debate to go on, and we made every effort in the world to agree upon the terms of a bill to which the Democrats and the Republicans would alike accede, so that there might be no dispute. After all, that was not wholly accomplished. Therefore, the President wanting this authority from Congress and the Secretary of the Treasury desiring this authority from Congress, there was not anything for us to do but to take the bill, which had already been passed by the other House, and undertake to pass it through the Senate.

Three Republican conferences were held. The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] was present at one of them. In those Republican conferences the whole question was discussed from one end to the other. The Senator from California said there was not much discussion of the question. There has not been upon the floor of the Senate, which has been listened to by any great number of Senators, but there has been in the Republican conferences, at one of which there were 50 Senators present, on which occasion for two or three hours at a time we debated the provisions of this bill. Then, at a second conference, and then at a third conference the matter was discussed, until we finally came to a conclusion as to what we wanted to do.

Of course, this is purely a business proposition; there is no politics in it; but I want to say to my friends upon this side of the Chamber that the question in its last analysis is simply this: Is the Senate, with 24 Republican majority, and a House of Representatives with 170 Republican majority, impotent to deal with a problem of this kind, and have we so little faith in the President of the United States that we are unwilling to confer upon him the authority to appoint a commission to fund our indebtedness which nobody disputes and which everybody admits is owing to us? That is the whole problem.

Mr. GLASS. Why have so little faith in the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mellon, as not to commit to him the authority to do this without raising any expensive commission to do it? As a matter of fact, the Treasury Department, with the explicit sanction of the Finance Committee of the Senate under Republican control and of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives under Republican control, was proceeding to fund this indebtedness when the negotiations were broken off. Why not trust the present Secretary of the Treasury? I am willing to trust him to go ahead and fund this indebtedness—and that is what ought to be done—according to the explicit terms of the act.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If my honorable friend from Virginia can get the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who sits immediately behind him and who is the leading Democratic member of the Finance Committee, to agree with him we may arrive at some definite conclusion; but the difficulty in the situation is——

Mr. GLASS. I can not speak for the Senator from North Carolina, but I imagine that the Senator from North Carolina would be willing for the Secretary of the Treasury under the terms of the law to fund the indebtedness.

Mr. SIMMONS. If I may be permitted, I desire to say that nobody has any objection, so far as I know, on this side of the Chamber, to the Secretary of the Treasury going ahead and funding these obligations under the existing law, but the trouble is that the Secretary of the Treasury does not wish to undertake to fund them under the existing law; he wishes to undertake to fund them under a new law which would give him unlimited power with respect to the extension of the interest upon these obligations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina if former Secretaries of the Treasury, namely, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and M. Houston, did not actually take steps to refund this indebtedness under the law?

Mr. SIMMONS. Undoubtedly they did.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I merely wish to say this——

Mr. SIMMONS. I tried to interrupt the Senator from Indiana a little while ago.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I merely wish to answer the query of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. So far as I was personally concerned, so far as practically all the Republican members of the Finance Committee were concerned, we were entirely willing to confide this power to the Secretary of the Treasury and place it in his keeping; but there was strenuous objection by my friend from North Carolina and by other Democratic members of the Finance Committee to that plan. They talked about the lodgment of such great power and the aggregation of such tremendous authority in the hands of a single man, and all that sort of thing. Then we tried to reach an agreement with them and to arrive at some sort of an understanding.

So far as I am personally concerned, this bill would long ago have become a law, and the Secretary of the Treasury alone would have been empowered to do that which we seek here to give power to a commission to do, but we could not get the Democratic Members to agree to that.

Mr. GLASS. The Secretary of the Treasury has authority under the law to do it now without asking the Democratic Members of the Senate or anybody else.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Precisely; but he not only wanted that confirmed by Congress, but, as I said a while ago to my friend from California, instead of snatching power from Congress he is coming here and asking Congress to affirm the power that he already has.

Mr. GLASS. No; he is asking Congress to amplify that power.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Amplify it in what way—to give him authority to do something that now he can not do?

Mr. McKELLAR. He is asking authority to extend the payment of the interest until 1947.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Which the Senator has already agreed should be extended for two or three years; and if that be a violation of the law he can violate it further.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I would rather the Senator would not ask it until I make a further statement, then I will yield to him.

Conditions have changed since these agreements were made; the whole world has suffered a complete metamorphosis. Whole nations have become bankrupt which before were wealthy. People are now stranded who before were in affluence and were in a prosperous condition. We must deal with the situation as we face it, and that is the present condition. I undertake to say to Senators that if we were to confer upon Congress the right to collect this debt we should never collect it. The collection of debt is not a legislative function; it is one which is purely administrative, and can not be left in the hands of the American Congress to consummate.

Mr. GLASS. What I am complaining about is that the executive officers do not proceed under the law as it exists and fund this indebtedness. They are fully authorized to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I will yield to the Senator, as he is a member of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should also like to ask the Senator from Indiana a question before he leaves this subject.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senator will have to ask it quickly, for I am called out of the Chamber, and shall have to leave in a few moments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well, I shall endeavor to ask it when I have an opportunity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there has never been in the committee, so far as I have heard, any disposition to take the settlement of these matters out of the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. The committee was perfectly willing for the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed and settle these matters under the law; but the Secretary of the Treasury said, "I do not desire to proceed under the existing law; I desire additional authority; I desire additional legislation." What we are dealing with now is the additional legislation which the Secretary demands.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana says that after long discussion in the committee we came to an agreement. We did come to an agreement and that agreement was written into the bill and the bill was authorized, by the unanimous vote of the Finance Committee, to be reported to the Senate by the chairman of the committee with the distinct understanding, so far as the minority members of the committee were concerned, they would make no objection and interpose no obstacle to the speedy passage of that measure. It was unanimously agreed upon. We were willing to give the Secretary of the Treasury powers which were thought necessary, but the agreement which we reached was to limit those powers in respect to certain questions.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate since the Senator has referred to it—and I presume that is the agreement he has in mind—to what that agreement was. It was in the nature of a proviso to the general powers given to the Secretary of the Treasury. It was prepared by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] and myself in collaboration.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I am perfectly familiar with that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senate would like to hear it in view of this discussion. The proviso was as follows:

> That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of the maturity of any bonds or obligations due the United States by any foreign Government beyond the 15th of June, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 5 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, or to cancel or remit any part of the principal or interest of such bonds or obligations except through payment thereof.

Then it went on to limit his power as to the exchange of bonds of one Government for those of another.

With that limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury, we were perfectly content that he might proceed with the settlement of these obligations; but, Mr. President, in line with the suggestion of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that we have come upon a time when the legislative branch of the Government is under the dictatorship of the Executive branch of the Government, after that agreement had been reached, following long hearings which were granted to the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he discussed every feature of the case, and we had discussed every feature of the case in his presence—after we had come to this agreement and had limited his power in this way and by unanimous consent had authorized the bill to be reported, the acting chairman of the committee rose in his seat in this body and stated, I think, that on the next day he would at some time during the day report that bill; but he never did report it. Some time during that day executive influence against which the Senator from California so justly is inveighing was brought to bear upon the majority membership of that committee and it had the effect of inducing them to withdraw that bill and cancel that agreement which, after long discussion, we had reached, and they proceeded to eliminate the essential provision of those limitations, namely, the provision with reference to the rate of interest and the extension of the time of the payment of interest.

As I have said repeatedly on the floor, my only contention and quarrel here to-day is with respect to that elimination. I am willing for the Secretary to enjoy the other powers which it is proposed to grant to him, but I think it would be extremely dangerous to grant him this power. The reason I think it would be exceedingly dangerous is because the Secretary made it clear in his testimony before the committee that the method of extending this interest which he has in mind, the method which commends itself to his judgment is the incorporation of the deferred interest into the interest rate of the bonds so that the accrued interest would nowhere appear in the principal of the obligation, but would only exist in the rate of interest. He not only said that he himself thought that was a good business proposition, but he stated that that had been discussed at the White House and had also been discussed in a Cabinet meeting, and that the President highly commended that method of adjustment of the deferred interest.

Not only that, Mr. President, but it was afterwards disclosed that the President in an address—so I have been told; I have never read the address and never saw it myself in the newspapers, but I have been told about it—delivered by him in the city of New York discussed this method of settlement in terms of high approbation.

The Secretary of the Treasury not only said that he thought that was a good proposition, but he said that he thought that if this adjustment should be made it would give these bonds a very ready sale in the markets of the United States; and coming right upon the heels of those statements of the Secretary of the Treasury there was an announcement made from the White House, carried in the Associated Press dispatches, that the administration had practically come to the conclusion and understanding that $4,000,000,000 of British bonds should be put upon the market and sold, and out of the proceeds the bonus for the soldiers should be paid.

Mr. President, I believe that to be the method that the Secretary of the Treasury has in his mind. I think that would be an outrage upon the people of the United States, because if those bonds are taken in that form, the principal being only the original sum loaned, and the interest being covered up in the rate, it is clear to my mind that those bonds, if sold in the markets of the United States or in the markets of the world, would bring practically only the principal sum, and the purchaser of those bonds and not the people of the United States would get the benefit of the accrued interest, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the country would lose the interest until 1946.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but not merely until 1946; it would lose, in addition, every dollar of the deferred interest, now amounting to a billion dollars. The Secretary said that he intended, because he thought it would be necessary, to further defer these interest payments. In some cases, he said, he might have to defer these interest payments for a year or two years only. He said he was certain of collecting it only in the case of Great Britain. He expected in all probability to have to extend it in every other instance, and in some instances he said he might have to extend it as long as 10 years; but that makes it worse. If he were to-day to adjust this whole indebtedness upon that basis and take obligations of foreign Governments to the extent of $10,000,000,000—that is, the amount of the principal sum—and cover the $1,000,000,000 of interest in the rate of interest which he may take, and if the United States Government should put those bonds on the market, as it was said a little while ago the administration had declared only recently that it had a present purpose to do in the case of $4,000,000,000 of them, and they sold for par or even a considerable sum above par, the United States in case of a par sale would lose every cent of the billion dollars of interest, and in the case of a sale above par it would lose also a very considerable portion of it, depending upon how much above par those bonds could be sold for.

That is the objection to this power. In the light of this testimony of the Secretary, in the light of this declared purpose on his part, in the light of his commendation of this outrageous method, so far as the rights of the people of this country are concerned, I myself hesitate to grant him the right to settle this deferred interest in any way that he may see fit to settle it, and that is the only controversy that I am making here. I do not care anything about the minimum rate of interest. I believe we have come to an agreement as to that. I understood that the Senator from North Dakota introduced an amendment, after the conclusion of my speech here on the first day, providing that the rate of interest should not be less than the rate fixed under the existing law, which was the Liberty bond act. That settles that particular point, but it leaves open the vital question of the adjustment of the deferred interest and the vital question of whether that interest shall be any further deferred, and if further deferred, how it shall be adjusted and settled. That is the controversy here to-day.

The Senator from Indiana can not escape this question by saying that we have already agreed once to the deferment of this interest; and, Mr. President, that is the reason why this accumulated interest is here, or the bulk of it. Great Britain was paying her interest up to the time of that agreement, I think. I think France was paying hers. They might have continued to pay it but for that agreement. I do not think the agreement ought ever to have been made. I doubt very much the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury to make any such agreement; but he made it, and the present Secretary of the Treasury said that he felt in honor bound to recognize it. The committee concurred in that, and the controversy here is not with reference to the agreement as to extending the time of payment of interest by the former Secretary of the Treasury. The very act itself recognizes the fact that that three-year period will not expire until the 15th day of June, and nobody expects any interest to be collected before the 15th day of June, but we do expect that after the 15th day of June these Governments shall give us an obligation to pay this principal and to pay this interest as provided in the present law.

Now, the Secretary of the Treasury says, "I want authority to make an arrangement different from the present law. I want authority further to defer the payment of this interest in this adjustment, and I want to write that agreement in the bond," and that is the cause of our controversy; but what I am insisting upon, Mr. President, is that the question here to-day is not the question of what we are to do in the way of leniency toward the foreign Governments.

The question here is, Are we going to demand that our book account, so to speak—for the most of it is nothing more than an I O U, some of it does not even rise to that dignity, but is a mere book account—are we going to permit this to continue a book account or are we going to require that our creditors, without regard to whether they are able to pay to-morrow or the next day or the next year, shall put that indebtedness in the form in which obligations of this kind are ordinarily required to be put, or are we going to let it remain an open account?

The proposed commission is not to be appointed for the purpose of collecting these debts. This commission is to be formed solely for the purpose of obtaining a duly authenticated evidence of this indebtedness, the amount of the principal, the rate of interest, and the time of payment of the interest. That is to be the duty and that is to be the function of this commission. It is not a collecting agency. When these Governments shall have done their duty and given us their obligations to pay this existing indebtedness, when they shall have converted it from an open account into bonds bearing a fixed rate of interest, then if they are not able to pay on the dates fixed the interest or the principal they can raise that question, and the United States can deal with it according to its judgment under the conditions that may then be presented.

Mr. President, I want to say that so far as I am concerned, if the majority will restore the provisions of the bill that we agreed to with reference to the limitation upon the power of the Secretary as to the time of payment of interest I shall have no further objection to their bill. I rose only for the purpose of answering some suggestions made by the Senator from Indiana. I have strayed a little from that unintentionally; but before I take my seat I wish to call the attention of the Senator from North Dakota to what I regard as the inadequacy of the amendment which he offered the other evening and which by common consent was agreed to with reference to the rate of interest.

The Senator added to the bill, following this provision, language which I shall read in a moment. The original committee amendment read:

Provided, That nothing provided in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or obligations due the United States by any foreign Government beyond June 15, 1947.

That was already in the bill. The Senator's amendment added:

Or to fix the rate of interest at less than that fixed by existing law.

I stated that I had no objection to that, and I have not; but I do not think it is broad enough to cover the purpose of the Senator. In addition to the loans made out of the Liberty bond and Victory bond funds, the rate of interest on which was fixed by the acts authorizing their creation and sale, there is a floating indebtedness amounting, I think, to seven or eight hundred million dollars, the rate of which is not fixed in the law. I understand that the rate has been agreed upon, probably, between the Governments, and has been fixed at 5 per cent, but it is not fixed in the law. I fear, therefore, that the Senator's amendment would not cover those cases; and I am bringing the matter to his attention so that if he agrees with me he may change his amendment so as to include those cases.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator is correct in saying that the amendment as adopted does not properly cover the whole subject of those loans; and while the Senator says that these obligations have been agreed upon as bearing 5 per cent interest, I do not think he is correct in all respects in that statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I simply surmised that from something I had heard.

Mr. McCUMBER. Some of them bear as high a rate of interest as 6 per cent. I do not think we ought to exact 6 per cent interest on them. I do not think we ought to exact even 5 per cent from those countries on such bonds as they may give. The amendment as it now stands provides that the rate of interest shall not be less than that provided by existing law. Under the existing law, the rate of interest shall not be less than the highest rate of interest that our bonds bear. The highest rate of interest that our Liberty bonds bear is 4¼ per cent. I think, therefore, it would be better if we would just fix the rate at, say, not less than 4¼ per cent. It would then conform to the present law and would also fix the rate on these other obligations at not less than 4¼ per cent.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should not object to that at all. My only suggestion to the Senator is that he let his amendment as to 4¼ per cent be sufficiently broad to include this floating debt.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would then, because, as the Senator says, the trouble with the amendment as it now stands is that it simply provides that the interest shall not be less than the interest fixed by existing law, and the law does not provide for the interest upon those other obligations.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then I understand the Senators' proposition. I did not at first understand it. He wants to change it so that it shall read:

Or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4¼ per cent per annum.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I agree that that would cover both cases, and I myself have no objection to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. If there is no objection, then I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCUMBER. I now offer the amendment which I have indicated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment so that it will read:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or obligations due the United States by any foreign Government beyond June 15, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4¼ per cent per annum.

Mr. McCUMBER. And I should like to add, after the words "United States," the words "of America." That is the language used elsewhere in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that modification will be made. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who has recently addressed the Senate, is not present, because, as I understand, there is but very little difference existing between us if we get down to fundamentals. I judge from what the Senator from Indiana has said—and it seemed to me he was very frank in his admissions and statements as to the objects to be accomplished by this legislation—that the amendment I have proposed, and that is printed and on the desks of Senators, would meet entirely the condition as he states it.

Mr. President, we loaned certain money to foreign Governments. We did it, or the Secretary of the Treasury did it, by virtue of the act of Congress or several acts of Congress giving to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to loan money to our allies during the war. He loaned that money. The Allies borrowed the money, accepted the money, and thereby a contract was consummated between our Government and each and every Government that borrowed the money. The contract is written. It is stated in the statute that gives the Secretary of the Treasury authority to make the loan. It is conceded by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that under that authority and under those statutes the Secretary of the Treasury to-day has authority to fund every one of those loans and that no additional authority is necessary.

Now, that being the case, as far as the loans which we made to foreign Governments are concerned, there can be no necessity for this legislation or any other legislation. In fact, we having loaned the money under the stipulations contained in those several statutes and the Governments of Europe having accepted the money under those statutes, we are in honor and in law bound to observe those statutes and have no authority to change the condition of the loans without the consent of the country that borrowed the money. Neither have they any authority to change the stipulations of the loan without our authority.

Hence, it is conceded here in this controversy now that as far as foreign money is concerned no legislation is necessary. No one denies that. I pause for any Senator to question it, if there is any such question. I would like to be shown if there is any doubt on the proposition I have just laid down.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say to the Senator that I think there is absolutely no doubt, but I think the present law does not give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to extend the time of the interest payment, and that is what the Secretary of the Treasury wants.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, there comes the dispute. Has the Secretary of the Treasury the right to fund the interest past due? I think that he has. I have no doubt of it, but I shall not stop to argue that for a moment. If he has not that authority, let us give him the authority.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator if there are not some debts owing to the United States not covered by the law?

Mr. NORRIS. I am coming to those. I am speaking now of the money loaned to the foreign Governments under the Liberty loan acts.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is correct in that respect.

Mr. NORRIS. If there is any question, except the possibility of the deferred unpaid interest not being included in the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, I should like to have some Senator suggest it to me now. The Senator from Indiana, a member of the committee, has admitted that there is none.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a moment to say that the distinguished former chairman of the Finance Committee, the late Senator Penrose, interpreted the law to mean that the Secretary of the Treasury even had authority to fund the interest, too, and the Ways and Means Committee of the House, as well as the Finance Committee of the Senate, agreed entirely with that interpretation of the law.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with that interpretation myself, but it is a little thing to quarrel about. Rather than have any difficulty over it, if the Secretary of the Treasury thinks that he has not that authority, I am in favor of giving it to him.

It seems that during the war there were some other debts incurred by certain foreign Governments to our Government, that we sold some material to France, for instance, food, sugar, clothing, war material, and so forth, so there was some indebtedness owing to our Government from other Governments on various accounts. The United States Grain Corporation holds securities of those Governments, and the United States Grain Corporation is the Government of the United States, as everybody knows. The War Department and the Navy Department each sold supplies to foreign Governments, and those Governments have not yet paid for those supplies. The American Relief Administration holds the obligations of some of those foreign Governments that have not yet been paid.

The Secretary of the Treasury says, "I have not any authority to fund those obligations in long-time bonds," and I think it is conceded that he does not have that authority. He does have authority to collect them. If anybody wants to pay any of those bonds, he has authority now to take the money, either principal or interest. If it is desirable to give to him authority to fund those items of indebtedness in long-time bonds, we ought to enact a law giving that authority. As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to give him that authority.

When we have done those things, then, we have done all that is necessary, according to the statement of the Senator from Indiana himself, representing the committee in speaking to the Senate to-day. I think I have accomplished those things by an amendment which I wish to propose to the Senate.

Before I do that I desire to call attention to what the Senator from Indiana said as another reason why we ought to legislate. He said that the Secretary of the Treasury felt as though they would like to be backed up by new legislation of Congress. I am willing to do that. If they think one act is not enough, I am willing to give them another one, so there will be no doubt about it.

I have offered an amendment that cares for all those propositions. It proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

> The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to refund or convert the principal and interest—

I say the principal and interest now, so that is covered—> of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration, arising out of the World War into bonds of such foreign Governments in accordance with the law providing for the loaning of money to such foreign Governments in force at the time such obligation was incurred.

Now, does not that cover it all? Is there anything left out?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Under the proposed amendment of the Senator what would be the rule with reference to the payment of interest upon the bonds?

Mr. NORRIS. The law that was in force at the time the money was borrowed would apply.

Mr. BORAH. Would that provide for annual or semiannual payments of interest?

Mr. NORRIS. In my opinion, semiannual interest would be provided for, but Senators disagree on that proposition as to what the law provided. I am proceeding on the theory that we have not any authority, without their consent, to change the contract made with those Governments which borrowed the money, and hence we can not make one side of the contract and enforce it or have not any moral right to enforce it.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, we can not change it without their consent, but if we take a bond under the Senator's proposed amendment, does the Senator understand the interest upon the bond would be paid semiannually or annually?

Mr. NORRIS. Semiannually.

Mr. BORAH. There is nothing in the present law to that effect?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think the present law provides for that.

Mr. BORAH. I think it would provide for annual payments.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can give the Senator the law for that, if he would like to hear it?

Mr. BORAH. I should like to hear it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think there is no question about the first Liberty bond act. Under the second Liberty bond act the provision is not thus limited, and I think that if we operated under that act, it could be made payable annually, but under the first one I think there can be no question, because it reads as follows:

> The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized on behalf of the United States to purchase at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

If they contained the same terms and conditions, that would mean, of course, the same rate of interest and the interest payable the same as on the bonds, and the interest on the bonds was payable semiannually. Therefore there would not be any question that the sums received under the first Liberty loan act would have to be funded into bonds bearing interest payable semiannually.

Mr. BORAH. Then, what is the objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska? It covers the whole proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer that when the Senator from Nebraska has concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator what would be the law with reference to those obligations not secured by bonds? What law would control those?

Mr. McCUMBER. There is none except in the agreements which were made by the several nations themselves, some of which bear 5 per cent interest and some 6 per cent interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator ask his question of me?

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask it now of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from North Dakota has answered the question as the law exists now. If my amendment were agreed to as I have offered it, then the stipulations of the bond in reference to those obligations to which the Senator from Florida refers would be just the same as those relating to the borrowed money. There would be no difference.

It may be that there ought to be some change. It may be we should propose to these other Governments some change. If that be true, we ought to say so in so many words, but we ought to remember, whether it is semiannual, quarterly, or annual interest, that the law is already passed, the contract is already made, and we have no honorable right to vary it or to change it in any way without getting the consent of the other parties to the contract.

If it be true, as the Senator from Indiana so often said, that there is nothing else to accomplish except to include these items of indebtedness, and to make it sure about the unpaid interest or past-due interest, and to reinforce the President and the Secretary of the Treasury by an additional act reinforcing the old act—if that is all, and, as I view his argument, that is all he claims it is desirable to do, then certainly we should not go any further than to adopt the amendment which I have proposed.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator, under his proposed amendment, taking the obligation of $400,000,000 owing by France for the purchase of war materials, what law was in force at the time that obligation was entered into governing the terms of the purchase?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator raises a point that it may be very proper to include as an amendment to the amendment which I have proposed. For instance, France, at a time when our people at home were paying 20 cents a pound, bought sugar from us at 2 cents a pound, for which she has not yet paid. Now, if France made a contract with our Government at the time she bought, with which this amendment would conflict, then I confess that we ought to take that into consideration. We have not any right to vary that and we ought to comply with our contract made at the time.

Mr. LENROOT. There was no law in force with reference to the transaction which would have authorized our Government to accept bonds at all.

Mr. NORRIS. No; there was not.

Mr. LENROOT. Yet the Senator's amendment refers to bonds in accordance with the law in force at the time the obligation was incurred.

Mr. NORRIS. It refers to the law "providing for the loaning of this money." I have interlined that. It is not printed in the amendment which the Senator evidently has. I think the interlineation I have made covers the point raised by the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to call his attention also to the fact that not only was there no law in reference to the interest upon the obligations of foreign Governments which might be obtained by making these advances to them or selling property to them, but there is no law relative to funding them into long-time obligations.

Mr. NORRIS. No; there is not.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is nothing in the proposed amendment of the Senator which would provide for the funding of those into long-time obligations, because there is no law for it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the amendment covers that, but there was not any such law at that time. Suppose we take one of these Governments that does not want to do this. They can pay us. If they pay for these things that were purchased, the Government of the United States will take the money. There is no hardship on them unless they would show, which I take it can not be shown—I have never heard of such a thing—that at the time they made the purchase of food or clothing or war materials they had an agreement with our Government that the debt should not be paid for 10 years or some such thing as that. If that be true, we, of course, have no authority to violate the contract. But I am assuming that these things were sold and turned over to those foreign Governments practically on the basis of a cash sale, and that they have not paid yet. They ought to pay, and they ought to pay interest from the time the sale was made, and probably will. I think they would be glad to have that included.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point I wanted to make with reference to the Senator's amendment was that while it authorizes the commission to fund into long-time obligations these other obligations which were not war obligations at all, it provides that they shall be funded in accordance with the law in force at the time such obligations were incurred. There was no law in force at that time relating to this whatever.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true, and the Senator has read the amendment as it is printed. As I read it and as I intend to offer the amendment and as it will be worded when I offer it, it will cover that very point. If the Senator will turn to the printed amendment I will tell him where the change is. In line 8, after the word "law," I propose to insert the words "providing for the loaning of money to such foreign Governments."

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that covers it.

Mr. NORRIS. This is the way it would then read:

> * * * arising out of the World War, into bonds of such foreign Governments in accordance with the law providing for the loaning of money to such foreign Governments in force at the time such obligation was incurred.

That would include all the various things that have been mentioned here.

Mr. McCUMBER. What the Senator means is in accordance with the Liberty loan bond acts?

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I mean.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make the point of no quorum?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Moses	Shortridge
Borah	Heflin	Nelson	Simmons
Bursum	Johnson	Nicholson	Sterling
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Swanson
Caraway	Kellogg	Oddie	Townsend
Colt	Kenyon	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	La Follette	Pepper	Warren
Dial	Lenroot	Phipps	Watson, Ind.
Fletcher	Lodge	Pittman	Williams
France	McCumber	Poindexter
Glass	McKinley	Reed
Hale	McNary	Sheppard

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. HARRIS. My colleague [Mr. WATSON of Georgia] is absent on official business.

The names of the absent Senators were called, and the following Senators answered to their names when called:

Wadsworth Walsh, Mont.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Broussard Cameron Cummins Sutherland

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I read the amendment to the pending bill which I offered, it has an interlineation in it which changes the form of the amendment. I now reoffer the amendment in order that it may be printed correctly, just as I have offered it to-day, and I ask that it be printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if I may, I desire to have the attention of Senators for just a very few moments, and especially do I desire the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I have great confidence in the legal ability of the Senator from Virginia; also in his good judgment in dealing with matters of this kind.

The Senator from Virginia two or three different times asked the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] why not allow the Secretary of the Treasury to go ahead and fund these obligations under the present law and under the conditions prescribed at the time the law was enacted? It is a fair question, and involves the only real matter in issue now between any of the Senators or between the two sides of the Chamber. There is no question that the Secretary of the Treasury could to-day fund these obligations into such obligations as would correspond with our own obligations which were made under the several Liberty loan acts. I am compelled to disagree with the Senator from Virginia as to the right to fund the accumulated interest, but that is such a small matter comparatively, that I do not wish to consume any time in discussing it. I wish to answer the Senator's question, why not now go ahead and settle and fund these obligations in accordance with the present law?

Mr. President, if the Senator from Virginia had an agreement with a debtor under which the debtor was to pay him a certain sum of money upon a certain date, and thereafter the debtor lost his property, for instance, if his buildings were destroyed by fire without insurance, and his whole financial condition were changed, if he made a new agreement with that debtor he would make that agreement in accordance with the condition of the debtor at the time the new agreement was made. Let us remember the fact that these loans were made under laws which were passed on April 24, 1917, and September 24, 1917. They were made in the exigency of one of the worst conflicts that the world has ever seen; they were made with debtors who were struggling for their very existence and life. We could have exacted of those debtors at that time almost any conditions on the face of the earth with reference to the loans, and they would have acceded to them.

It was a most desperate time in their warfare, a time when the question of victory or defeat was held in the balance; it was no time to quibble over conditions. We fixed the law; they accepted its terms; and under it they agreed to pay at the expiration of whatever time our bonds should run, and to pay interest in accordance with the bonds which we issued.

After that time and before the close of the war those nations not only entered into the jaws of death, but into the bowels of hell, and following the close of the war they find themselves unable to meet the obligations which they agreed to meet. We know that they can not meet them. Believing that they can not meet them at this time it seems advisable to make terms with them that will be such as will enable us to have our debt paid at some time at least, and to secure interest thereon. Believing that it will be possible to have our debt become payable immediately from those who can afford to pay immediately, and very soon from the others, we now consider that it is better to make a new arrangement with them under the situation which now confronts the world. That is the reason, Mr. President, that we are undertaking to empower, if not the Secretary of the Treasury at least the Secretary of the Treasury and a commission acting with him, to make the very best terms that can be made with each nation.

Since we took those obligations and made those loans national boundaries have been changed and new nations have come into existence; new countries have assumed a part of the obligations due the United States. We can not enforce the old law; the debtors can not pay according to its terms; at least none of them can pay the obligations when they shall mature, and probably not more than one of them could begin the payment of interest immediately after new bonds shall have been given.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I can not allow the Senator to put me in the attitude of demanding the "pound of flesh" from the foreign Governments which are indebted to this Government. I do not object to a broad and liberal negotiation of this matter with our former allies. I am one of those persons who believe that our allies fought three years for us before we began to fight by their side. So what the Senator from North Dakota has said does not at all apply to any attitude which I entertain or have expressed here. If the Congress wishes to make new arrangements, if, in a large sense, Congress is obliged to make new arrangements, that is all right; but I want to commit the negotiation of the arrangements to the Secretary of the Treasury here at Washington with representatives of foreign Governments and not to raise up a large and expensive commission to be taking trips across the ocean and negotiating over there. Stated in a word, that is my attitude in reference to the matter. However, I feel obliged to disclaim the compliment which the Senator from North Dakota paid to my legal acumen. I am not a lawyer; I am a newspaper publisher.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator, I think, understands the law of this case as well as does any one of our so-called great constitutional lawyers.

I agree with the Senator in his statement that the Secretary of the Treasury could settle this matter, but the Senator also asked the question, why not allow the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the matter under existing law? My answer is that the existing law would not give him the latitude which it is necessary to give him for a proper settlement of the outstanding obligations. Let me read a portion of the first law under which the obligations were incurred. It provides as follows:

> The Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase, at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials—> and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

And I want that to be borne in mind—

Let us remember, first—and that has not been touched upon here—that there is no authority given under the law to take I O U's from any of these countries. What we were authorized to do was to purchase their bonds; and the terms and conditions were to be specified in the bonds, and those terms and conditions were to correspond in all essentials to the bonds which the United States should issue to secure the funds to make the loans. Now, why—and again I want the attention of the Senator from Virginia—why did not the several Secretaries follow that provision?

I will tell you why. Of course we were to give them credits for the amount—that is true—but the reason why it was not done was this, and it is apparent, and I have no criticism to make against the Secretaries: We first had to arrange to give them the credits, and then we had to arrange for our own bonds, and we could not tell what our own bonds would be either with reference to their interest or with reference to their maturity; and, therefore, we advanced the money under the exigencies of war before we issued our own bonds, and before we had determined what the rates of those bonds should be.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will yield for a question.

Mr. REED. Is not the Senator mistaken in his statement that we could not tell what the rate of interest would be on these bonds that we were to issue at the time we advanced the money? Is it not a fact that in every instance we first sold our bonds and then, having secured the money, proceeded to advance it?

Mr. McCUMBER. These are the facts: Of course, we paid no money until we got the money, and we could not get the money until we had issued the bonds. We, however, gave them a credit, and that credit was given before we sold the bonds, and they were allowed to pay out of that credit to merchants and manufacturers who furnished goods to these foreign Governments the amounts as they were purchased; but there was but little difference in the time, because we sold the first Liberty bonds in a very short time. The reason, however, is given by the Secretary. He testifies that they could not fix the rate of interest on the bonds at the time the credit was given. We had not arranged it, and we gave them their credit and arranged for the conditions of the credit before we sold the bonds; but, of course, we paid out nothing until after the bonds were sold.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, if the Secretary of the Treasury entered into an obligation for the United States to advance money before these bonds were sold, then he undertook to incur a debt on behalf of the United States, and acted without authority of law. In addition to that, however——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yielded for a question. I want to get through with this.

Mr. REED. Without disputing categorically the Senator's statement, I think he will find that there was money in the Treasury from the sale of these bonds in every instance where the United States incurred any kind of an obligation that is either legally or morally binding.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am simply giving the situation as I understand it. There is nothing in the law, as I understand it, that authorized this Government to take the I O U of any other Government. The authority is to purchase the bonds of these other Governments, just as I have read.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield first to the Senator who rose first, the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the authority is "to purchase * * * from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued." It does not say specifically "their bonds."

Mr. McCUMBER. The obligation was to conform to our bonds, and that really made bonds of them, both as to the time of payment and as to the rate of interest and as to the time when the interest was to be paid.

Mr. GLASS. It was utterly impracticable to take bonds as we technically understand the word "bonds." We took demand obligations, with the understanding that subsequently they were to be funded into time obligations, to wit, into bonds, which bonds were to bear the same rate of interest that our bonds bore and to contain the same general conditions.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly. That is exactly what I stated, and that is why I stated that it was impossible for them to get the bonds immediately when they gave the credit, because they must first determine exactly what our own bonds should be with reference to their maturity and rate of interest and terms of payment. I am not stating this for the purpose of criticism, but for the purpose of getting the matter before the Senate as clearly as I am able to present it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; for a question.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to ask the Senator a question, because I have become a little confused, I think, as to his reasons.

If the law under which we advanced the credits or money to these foreign Governments provided that they should issue to us their interest-bearing bonds having the same rates of interest and times of payment as the bonds we sold to raise the money, would it make any difference in the authority that the Secretary of the Treasury had in the matter whether the money was lent to these countries a year or five years before the rate of interest and the time of maturity of the bonds that we sold were ascertained? He would still have the authority to accept under those conditions their securities bearing that rate of interest and having the same length of time to run, would he not?

Mr. McCUMBER. If it was an obligation that corresponded to our obligation, he could accept it; he could purchase it.

Mr. CARAWAY. If they owed us money and they got the money from us under this law that said that they should secure it with their bonds, why would not the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury exist to-day to take those bonds under the conditions that existed at the time of the passage of the act?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is always disagreeable for any Senator to reiterate a statement he has just made two minutes ago, before the Senator came in.

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; I was here when the Senator commenced to speak and I have heard all that he said.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well. Then why does the Senator ask me again what I stated as clearly as the English language can express it that there is no doubt that the Secretary of the Treasury to-day, if the other Governments would issue their bonds, could receive bonds in accordance with the law as it then existed?

Mr. CARAWAY. For the entire indebtedness?

Mr. McCUMBER. I stated, for all, with the exception of the accumulated interest.

Mr. CARAWAY. Why would not that right exist?

Mr. McCUMBER. Simply because there is no authority in the law for that; but if the Senator will allow me to take one subject at a time there is no law that authorizes the Secretary to do anything more than purchase the obligations—I do not care what you call the obligations—of the debtor country, and those obligations shall bear interest at least at the same rate and be payable at the same time as the bonds which we issue. Under that kind of a law I insist that there is no kind of authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to say that he will take a part of that interest when it comes due and add it to the principal. The interest becomes the property of the United States. When it is not paid it is simply the same as any other accrued obligation, and no authority is given to add the interest to the principal.

Mr. CARAWAY. And, if the Senator will permit me, the accumulated interest is a part of the debt that the foreign Government owes us; is it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, of course they owe us the interest.

Mr. CARAWAY. And for any debt that they owe us under this act the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to accept bonds?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the Secretary was authorized to purchase the bonds, and the bonds were to bear interest; and when he was authorized to purchase interest-bearing bonds, the act did not provide that he should also relieve the countries from the interest and then attach it to the bonds. No such construction, in my opinion, can possibly be made.

But, Mr. President, I did not want to argue upon that at this time. I wanted to go through and explain why it is that the old law is inadequate under present conditions; and I stated that the mere matter of the interest, on which we disagree, was of very minor importance.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I quite agree that if it is in the mind of Congress to make different arrangements with foreign Governments, to make more liberal terms with foreign Governments, we can not proceed under existing law. I do not care to engage in the refinements of technique and definitions; but if the Senator will look on page 28 of the pamphlet dealing with bond issues he will see that Congress itself did not contemplate that the Secretary of the Treasury should immediately take bonds from foreign Governments, but that he should take the short-time obligations of foreign Governments, because in the text of the act the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized from time to time to convert any short-time obligations of foreign Governments which he may receive under the authority of this section into long-time obligations. In other words, it was totally impracticable, if not impossible, to have taken bonds as evidences of the indebtedness of foreign Governments, and therefore the Treasury took demand certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have admitted the impracticability of following that course. I have simply read the law to show that the authority was given to purchase bonds, and they have not yet purchased the bonds that were contemplated, and all that we have now are the I O U's of these Governments.

Mr. President, I have read what the law was, and how these loans were to be made. I desire to call attention now to our own bonds, the maturing principals of those bonds, and how much was loaned under each of the acts.

From the proceeds of the first Liberty loan we loaned to our allies $2,114,000,000. The first Liberty loan bonds become due in 1947, with the right of redemption in 1932. The first Liberty loan bonds contain the latest date of maturity of any of the Liberty bonds.

From the proceeds of the second Liberty loan we loaned to our allies $2,599,829,750. The second Liberty loan bonds become due in 1942, with a right of redemption in 1927, just five years from now.

From the proceeds of the third Liberty loan we loaned to our allies $987,605,000, and those Liberty loan bonds, without the right of redemption, become due in 1928, or six years from now.

From the proceeds of the fourth Liberty loan we advanced to our allies $3,772,349,659.38, and the fourth Liberty loan bonds become due and payable in 1938, with the right of redemption in 1933.

Now, I answer the Senator from Virginia, times have changed. Even if these foreign nations, under the stress of war, said that they would make any kind of a contract to secure money to carry on the war, even if they believed that they might be able to meet their indebtedness as early as the time fixed in these bonds, we know now that they can not do it under any circumstances. Now, we want to give them time, within 25 years, however. Under the present arrangement, in the case of the bonds issued under the first Liberty loan act, there is a possibility of a call for 1932. Under the others the call may be as early as six years from now, and in one instance within five years from now. Of course, the right of call is a right which the debtor nation can exercise; but taking the longest periods which some of these bonds may have to run, I believe the time is too short for these nations to feel that they can give their bonds in the amounts required, payable at that time.

Much has been said here about requiring the payment of interest to be made semiannually. I do not think the mere word "semiannually" has a great deal of signifiance, or even the word "annually." The whole trouble lies in the fact that there are some countries that can not pay the first year's interest one year or two years or three years from now; but we want their bonds, and if we provide by law that the bonds shall recite that the interest is to be paid semiannually or that it is to be paid annually, then the interest must be paid. In the first instance the interest becomes due in six months and in the second instance it becomes due in one year, so the question of whether it is payable annually or semiannually, I think, amounts to but very little; but the question of when it shall begin to be paid is a vital question, in which some of these countries are most desperately interested.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator does not imagine that he is answering me in any respect, because I have raised none of these issues at all. I have not objected to a very liberal basis of dealing again with foreign nations, nor have I presented here any argument in favor of compelling an immediate payment of interest or a semiannual or annual payment of interest. The Senator is projecting an entirely new proposition. All that I have contended for is that this funding may be done by the Secretary of the Treasury at vastly less expense and with greater expedition than it may be done by this commission that it is proposed to create.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I am answering that part of the Senator's query addressed to the Senator from Indiana in which he asked why the Secretary can not make the arrangement under the present law.

Mr. GLASS. The Secretary can make arrangements under the present law unless the terms of our agreement with the foreign nations are to be changed. If that is to be the case, of course, he can not make arrangements under the existing law.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we are in exact accord then. I would be perfectly willing to intrust the settlement of the whole matter to the Secretary of the Treasury or to the Senator from Virginia as a single individual to settle those accounts. But, Mr. President, there was serious objection to allowing the Secretary as a single individual to settle these matters. There was a fear on the part of some at least that his inclination would be too liberal toward the debtors; that he would be too much inclined to give them longer time than was necessary, and in order to obviate those objections, and they were from both sides of the Chamber, the new bill was introduced, in which we provided not only that the Secretary of the Treasury should be a member of the commission but that there should be four other members who should be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. This was done in order to meet that objection. That is the bill now before us, and because of that I think we will have more votes for it than if we had left it with the Secretary alone.

Mr. GLASS. That may be, but it will not get my vote, because the other four commissioners will merely agree with the Secretary of the Treasury and draw their salaries and have their fares paid across the ocean and back.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not agree with a great many on his side of the Chamber and some on this side of the Chamber as to whether the settlement should be made by a commission of five persons or by the Secretary alone. Taking the view of the Senate, we may say the consensus of opinion as between the two propositions, I believe the Senate is in favor of the commission.

Now, I desire to answer the proposition made by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. They want to settle this matter just as the law stands. They want to deal with each nation just as that nation stands and just as our old law, of course, contemplated. But can we do that now? I say no, we can not. Let me give but one illustration.

France owes the United States over $3,000,000,000. France owes Great Britain, I think, just about $3,000,000,000. We go to France and ask her to give the bonds which will mature at some time in the future, and we agree with France. Great Britain asks France to give bonds to her. France can not pay them both, probably, at the same time. There might be a question of preference between those creditors. France would want to know and Great Britain, very naturally, would want to know what arrangements we had made with the other nations, and we want to settle that matter. We say to Great Britain, "Give us a bond maturing in 1947 and drawing a rate of interest of 4½ or 5 per cent. You can have the right to recall it at any particular time." Great Britain says to France, "I want your bond in order that I may meet the American bond. I want the same rate of interest. I want the obligation to become due at about the same time so that I can meet my obligation." France says, "That is all right, but what about Italy? Russia owes me $1,000,000,000, and I want to know if Russia will give me her bonds which I can use, either in collecting the interest on them or selling them and guaranteeing them in order that I can meet my English bonds in order that the Englishman can meet the American bonds."

It is almost essential that we bring these nations together, in order that they may consult with each other and that we get a final settlement, so that the nations will know what their obligations are, so that they can be of assistance to each other; and I know of no other way than the appointment of the commission or the Secretary of the Treasury to settle those questions between them.

But, say some of the critics, they are already in arrears. How will it hurt them any more if they get further in arrears? That can be answered, Mr. President, and answered fairly. The present is a demand obligation. There is an understanding and a law that it is to be converted into a long-time obligation. It is, we may say, in an inchoate state at the present time and it is to be ripened into a national bond. That is a very different proposition from what it would be if we took the bond and made the interest payable annually, the first year's interest due in a year, when the foreign country would be in default. If France were unable to meet her payments one year after she gave her bonds, she would declare to the world that she was bankrupt. That would destroy her credit.

It is to our interest to prevent that. It is to our own interest that that shall not take place. We gain nothing by putting a country in a position in which it will be compelled to acknowledge its impotency and its inability to meet its obligations. It is a thousand times better for us to give ample time for each nation to make arrangements for the beginning of the payment of interest, so that each nation may be able to meet its obligation.

We would be a long time in settling, we might say, with either Italy or France if we would say to them we will take your bond on the 26th day of January, 1922, and on the 26th day of January, 1923, you must pay the interest upon that bond. Either of those countries would hesitate a long time before she would give her bond in that way. But we want to get the bond, we want to get the settlement, and that is the reason why we are providing a commission that may take into consideration all of these matters and do justice not only by the creditor nation but by the debtors as well, so far as it can be done.

Mr. President, I think that presents as clearly and succinctly as I can present them the reasons why we should give some latitude to the Secretary of the Treasury or to any commission that may be appointed in fixing the time when the interest payments shall begin.

Before closing I wish to say that I have had a telephone message from the Undersecretary of the Treasury that my statement that the credits were given before we issued our own obligations was correct. The first credit was given under the first Liberty bond act, as the Undersecretary of the Treasury informs me, two or three days after the law was enacted, while our bonds were not fixed and determined upon or sold until a month or more afterwards.

Mr. KENYON. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed to the pending bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered.

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I avail myself of the privilege accorded under our rules to submit some observations on the deplorable condition of American agriculture which prevails throughout the country.

This condition is so serious that the President has been constrained to call a conference to consider measures for immediate relief. I venture to say at this time that if this conference now in session would render a real service to agriculture it will search out the fundamental, underlying causes of this distressing situation.

I offer as a text pertinent to the work which this convention has in hand these words from Holy Writ:

> They have sown the wind and they shall reap the whirlwind.

Our agricultural population is the most intelligent, the most advanced and thoroughly scientific in the prosecution of its industry of any people on the face of the earth.

American farmers are industrious, frugal, thrifty. They work long hours, and every member of the family is a helper upon the farm.

Our soil is unrivaled in richness; our climate is unsurpassed; our harvests, the country as a whole considered, are always abundant.

We have been visited by no plagues, ravaged by no pestilences, and in all our history we have never known the face of famine.

And yet to-day, notwithstanding all of its natural advantages, notwithstanding the intelligence and industry and patience of the farmer, American agriculture, the great basic industry of our national life, lies utterly prostrate and helpless before all the country.

Mr. President, I verily believe that this deplorable condition is an indictment against the justice and integrity of the National Government.

It has not come upon us as a sudden thing following in the wake of war. Each census report for decades has given us full warning, and the accumulated wrongs which have finally beaten agriculture prostrate have for years been glaringly manifest to every observer of public affairs.

I have read the reports of the proceedings of the agricultural conference now in session in this city, so far as they are available, in the daily press. I have read the complete report of the address delivered by the President at the opening of the conference. I have analyzed as carefully as I could the statements which have been made, both by the President and the other speakers, at the first day's conference as to the causes of the present condition of agriculture and the remedies which they propose for its resuscitation. All of the statements that I have read in the address of the President and the other speakers indicate a belief that the causes of the disaster which has befallen agriculture are transient in character and do not reach far below the surface, and that superficial remedies will restore this great industry to a healthy, normal life.

I disagree entirely with this view. I am convinced by 20 years of careful study of this problem that the causes of the present condition of agriculture lie far beneath the surface and are at the very roots of our economic and political system. It may be possible by measures of temporary relief to rescue some of the farmers and put them back again to producing the food and other prime necessaries upon which the life of the Nation depends, but no mere palliative measures will serve to make agriculture the great stable and productive industry which it deserves to be, and which it must be if we are to preserve a balanced economic life among the nations of the world. Nor will these palliatives even bring relief to those who through the forcible deflation of the last two years have been cast down from a condition of comparative prosperity into destitution and who have been dragged down by foreclosures and forced sales from the proud position of independent owners to the condition of tenants or agricultural laborers.

In order to see clearly the fundamental causes of the deplorable present conditions, it is necessary to review briefly the economic and political history of the United States during the last two generations, which in part some of us here are old enough to have seen with our own eyes. I will take only a few moments, sir, to review facts which I believe can not be disputed.

For 50 years the world has been drifting, and this country especially, into the condition in which it now finds itself. A half century ago there was in the United States an approach to equality of opportunity. Some were richer than others, but there was an unlimited scope for achievement through labor, invention, and enterprise. Business was organized in small units. Competition prevailed in industry. Combinations to restrain trade were virtually impossible, because each firm or corporation controlled so small a portion of the total business that thousands of concerns would have had to band together in a secret conspiracy to effect even a partial monopoly. Under these conditions of competition prices were fixed by production costs and business was done on a relatively small margin of profit.

The credit of the Nation, small as was the Nation then, was diffused throughout the entire country, and was administered locally, so that all those who were of good character and had reasonable security to offer could obtain the relatively small amounts of capital which they needed to carry on their enterprises. Free competition then ruled in trade, in commerce, and in industry.

But, sir, during the last half century a great change has come about. Industry, commerce, and finance have taken on monopoly forms. Monopoly interests have acquired control not only of the major industries but of raw materials, of fuel, of transportation, and of credit.

Through these monopolies great surplus profits were heaped up, were unjustly accumulated because of the monopoly power to exact from the consuming public prices that would insure the profit that satisfies monopoly, and, there being no field for their investment at home without creating competition which would destroy the monopolies already established, these interests have reached out to control similar opportunities in other countries. During these years feeble and fitful attempts to prevent the growth of these monopolies, or to control them after they were established, have been made from time to time, but any critical review of the cases which were started under the so-called Sherman Act will force the unbiased mind to the conviction that there was never real, downright sincerity behind the prosecutions; at least, it remains a recorded fact that the results were of no avail.

The unorganized people, with their attention constantly distracted by false issues or betrayed by false leaders, have thus far been defeated in their contests with organized wealth.

Mr. President, the secret of this failure, in my opinion, lies chiefly in the fact that the people as a whole have been unable to comprehend what the organized powers of wealth learned long ago. These monopolies and exploiters early discovered that the road to economic profit and power was through the control of government. They knew that a man may labor all his lifetime with his hands or his brains and have little more at the end of his life of industry and frugality than he had at its beginning. But they learned that by the use of the Government, the use of the State, to create special privileges wealth beyond measure can be amassed within a few years. For that purpose they have always been zealous to secure and maintain control of the machinery of government—control of the Presidency, control of the United States Senate, control of the House of Representatives, control of Cabinet appointments. While the minds of the people were directed by sham battles over inconsequential issues, the powers of wealth have spared neither trouble nor expense to insure that their servants should be in control of the powers of government. They have used their control of government to create for themselves special powers and privileges of various kinds. These privileges enabled those who possessed them to levy tribute on everyone else. They collect pennies, dimes, and dollars from the millions and by so doing accumulate billions for the few.

This they accomplish in a variety of ways, but chiefly by legislation relating to the great fundamental economic processes, of which the greatest are transportation and credit. Through those processes they control the economic and political life of the Nation, and inasmuch as these privileges can be maintained only by continuing control of the powers of government, they are careful to maintain that control and are ready at all times to spend millions if need be in order to insure its retention. In fact through the long processes of the years these great, powerful organizations have become the State, and, being the State, they legislate first to create economic privileges and then to protect them and increase the tribute which they collect.

The war completed the enthronement of the profit-taking, privileged, imperialistic group. They found they possessed a power greater than they had ever fully realized, and they used it during the war and in the years immediately succeeding the war as they had never dared to use it before. The stern demands of the war and the absorption of the people in patriotic endeavor of all kinds enabled them to cement their power still further. Thus the economic state and the political state have become so merged that to-day they can hardly be distinguished. Those who are nominally in control of the political government dare not make a move without first consulting those who rule the economic world—and the exercise of their power has been made manifest on this floor time and time again—and they have been forced time after time to abandon or reverse their most sacredly pledged policies when their financial masters so directed.

Through this process of cumulative monopolization and profiteering there has been created in the United States an inequality in the distribution of wealth which is without parallel in the history of the world. The poorest of our people are not yet, thank God, as wretched as the starving paupers of other countries, but this is only because in all the history of the world there has never been a nation so rich in natural resources as this, or a land peopled with men of so much intelligence and indomitable energy and purpose. But this fact only lends emphasis to the inequality in the distribution of wealth. With so little difference between the intelligence and ability of the highest and lowest, there is less excuse for wide variations in wealth and income. But in spite of this there has probably never been in all the history of the world any nation in which so large a percentage of the wealth was concentrated in the hands of a few as in the United States at the present time.

This inequality in the distribution of wealth, produced primarily by special-privilege legislation, is in itself a prime cause for the unending cycle of panics and depressions with which this Nation is afflicted. The excessive wealth and income which is taken as a tribute by the few is not and can not be consumed by them. Those from whom this excessive tribute was taken have not the means to purchase even the products of their own toil. The excessive wealth which is taken by the monopolists must be invested either in creating a productive capacity far greater than the balance of the population can consume or it must be invested in the exploitation of foreign countries.

In either case, sir, whether this surplus capital is invested at home or used in foreign exploitation the effect is the same. When through unequal distribution of wealth the unproductive capacity of a country far exceeds the ability of the people to purchase and consume industry can be kept going only by a process of inflation. Sooner or later a point is reached where what has come to be known as deflation becomes an absolute necessity. Moreover, experience has shown that this very process of deflation can be made as profitable to the great privileged interests as the period of apparent prosperity which precedes it.

This is how the process is worked: During the period of high prices and apparent prosperity the small properties which the people have acquired by their industry and thrift are mortgaged on the basis of the inflated value of the dollar in order to provide them with the working capital which they need to carry on and expand their enterprises. Such mortgages are placed upon the farms, the small factories, and the stores of the tradesmen. In the meantime prices inevitably advance faster than wages and several times as fast as salaries. A point is thus soon reached where the amount of commodities which can be purchased by the people appreciably declines and there is no longer a market for the full output of industry. Then comes deflation. Loans on farms, factories, stores, and homes are foreclosed, and those who control the credit of the Nation come into possession or control of the properties which had been given as security for the loans. Thus the financiers become the residuary legatees of the Nation's distress.

That is precisely what is taking place with respect to farm mortgages and agriculture at the present time. In 10 years the mortgages upon the farms of this country have more than doubled. The contract for the payment of the money is written into those mortgages in dollars; the period of depreciation comes; deflation is upon us; the mortgage must be paid according to its terms. At the time those mortgages were made they represented 27 per cent of the total value of the farms of the United States, whereas to-day, to be paid for in the deflated prices of the products taken from the farms, they represent, as nearly as can be estimated, fully 50 per cent of the value of the farms of this country.

Moreover, this process of inflation and deflation is doubly profitable for the financiers. They make their loans during the period of prosperity and high prices, when the purchasing power of the dollar is greatly depreciated. Then comes deflation, and those loans must be paid in dollars whose purchasing power may be twice as great as was the value of the dollar at the time the loans were made. A loan which was made when half a bushel of wheat was worth a dollar, must be repaid in dollars each of which will, we will say, buy a full bushel of wheat.

This process of forced deflation has now been under way in the United States for nearly two years. It was not a natural phenomenon, but was artificially produced by the powers that control the credit of the Nation, and the Federal reserve system was the instrument primarily used to accomplish it. It is commonly said that this process was first applied to the farmers, but this is not exactly accurate. It was first applied to the Liberty bondholders, who had subscribed for bonds far beyond their capacity upon a solemn pledge that the Government would see that they secured credit upon easy terms until their installments of payment were completed. But the time had come when the financiers of the country had decided, as they proclaimed in their confidential publications, one of which has been under my eye, that the Liberty and Victory bonds ought to be gathered into "strong hands." In other words, they wanted those bonds themselves, and they wanted them at rock-bottom prices, and so they proceeded through the instrumentality of the Federal reserve system to acquire those bonds. Without warning and in utter disregard of the solemn pledge made by the Government during the war, the Federal reserve system directed the curtailment of loans on these securities and suspended the preferential rate of interest which they had hitherto enjoyed. The banks called the loans based upon Liberty bonds, and thus forced these securities to be thrown upon the market to be gobbled up by "strong hands" at an enormous discount. Since these bonds got into these "strong hands" they have steadily increased in price.

The next great step was the deflation of the farmer, although in the meantime advantage had been taken of the opportunity to deflate some of the industries, such as automobiles, whose control did not yet rest securely in the hands of the great financial powers but was in part held by magnates of the Middle West, whose wealth had been developed by the phenomenal growth of this industry.

In all the history of the world, sir, there has probably never been an act unaccomplished by violence which caused such great destruction and suffering as the deflation of the farmers during the past two years. During the autumn of 1920, while crops were being harvested and when the farmer was looking forward to a winter of fair prosperity, the process of deflation began. Loans were called and renewals were refused. In the meantime freight rates had been raised so high by the Esch-Cummins law that the farmer could not afford to move his crops to the markets where they could best be disposed of. Thus the farmer was left helpless, and the prices of agricultural products crashed downward, downward, in the greatest decline that had ever been known within a similar period. Hundreds of country banks went down in the crash, but the great financial institutions were protected. No matter how unbusinesslike had been their policies and no matter how widely they had overextended their credit, like one of the greatest financial institutions of New York City, means were found to save them from bankruptcy. The immediate condition of agriculture to-day, sir, is but the natural consequence and the inevitable result of that policy of forcible deflation accomplished through the control of the Nation's credit by the will of a few great financiers. The destruction which they wrought can not be cured by the resolutions of any conference.

Verily, Mr. President—

They have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind.

I thank the Senate for its attention.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I wish the people of the whole country could have heard the splendid speech just made by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. He told the truth literally, when he said that there are certain financial interests in this country seeking to dominate and control every avenue of legitimate business. As the Senator was speaking about how agricultural products have been deflated I thought of what I had said here once before, that when that deflation was at the highest pressure a saucer of oatmeal and a saucer of corn flakes at the hotels in the city of Washington brought respectively within a cent and a half and 2 cents as much as oats and corn were bringing per bushel on the farms in the West.

As the Senator from Wisconsin proceeded with his speech I thought of how injuriously this deflation policy had affected the cotton farmers of the South; and as the Senator from Wisconsin was talking upon that line, I figured in my mind just what happened to the one-horse farmer in 1920. When he planted his crop in the spring of 1920 a bale of cotton was bringing 40 cents a pound or $200 a bale, and with his 10-bale crop he was enabled to pay a debt of $2,000. The price went down and down under the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board from 40 cents to about 9 cents a pound. Now, the average price is around 12½ cents, making the bale bring about $62.50. It would take that same farmer now three years and a little more, making 10 bales of cotton per year, to pay the indebtedness incurred in the spring of 1920, when cotton was bringing 40 cents a pound or $200 a bale, or $2,000 for the 10 bales.

That gives you an idea of what our farmers are suffering in the South. Under this deflation policy these debts hang over our people. They were incurred when everything was inflated. Now, forced sales and foreclosures, as the Senator has pointed out, have come one after another in rapid succession, and they have swept away thousands and millions of dollars' worth of property. In fact, the destruction of the values of farm products runs in the billions. In the one year of 1920 the deflation in the price of cotton cost the farmers of the South $1,625,000,000.

Mr. President, that is a tremendous loss for our people to sustain, and there is no excuse for it—none in the world—except to satisfy Wall Street's demand that deflation be had and that her harvest time should come, and come speedily, just as vultures follow on the battle field where people are stricken down and animals are killed. They hover over the place to reap their reward and feed and fatten upon the suffering creatures that are stricken down and are unable to defend themselves. They demanded that this thing should come, and it came.

As I stated here once before, a cotton manufacturer said in New York, it was reported in an editorial in the New York Commercial, when this price was rapidly falling, "We are willing to pay 30 cents a pound for cotton." Why, certainly he was willing to pay it, because cotton goods were selling then at a price that would warrant the farmer in receiving $1.25 a pound. They are selling to-day at a price that would warrant the farmer in receiving from 40 to 50 cents a pound; but how is he going to protect himself with a deflation policy instituted by a Federal Reserve Board cutting off the source of supply, depriving him of currency, depriving him of credit, and leaving him helpless out in the open, where the enemy is shelling him from Wall Street? That is what has been going on.

Mr. President, I did not intend to talk on that subject this afternoon, but I felt like saying this following the speech of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The agricultural industry is in a serious condition. The cattle industry of the West is in a deplorable condition. Certain sinister interests are at work. They are trying to break up a friendly nonpolitical combination that we have here in the Senate to give relief to the stricken agricultural sections of the South and West. From the President down they are hammering on the agricultural bloc. What is the agricultural bloc? Senators from the South, who represent people who are in dire distress, meeting Senators from the West, who come from a people who are suffering as our people are suffering, say, "This ought to be done" or "That ought to be done." The opponents of that policy say, "You are trying to do something that looks like class legislation," and they never lose an opportunity to hit the agricultural bloc a blow. Agriculture is the essential industry of the country. It is the corner stone of all other industries, and now they criticize that. They are angry because it looks as though we are trying to secure some relief for the great agricultural masses of America.

Now they have a conference going on here in the Capital. I hope good will come out of it. The president of the American Cotton Association told me that he had recommended some 45 or 50 delegates, and the Secretary of Agriculture did not appoint but 3 or 4 of them. One of those he recommended was Col. Armstrong, of Fort Worth, Tex., a great cattleman and a farmer who has just written a book—a splendid book. I am told, just published—"The Crime of '20." I want the Senator from Wisconsin to read it. The president of the American Cotton Association recommended that he be appointed, and they would not appoint him. In that book Col. Armstrong shows how he lost thousands upon thousands of dollars under the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board. Why not let him come here? He is a man of wealth and he has a big, brave heart, and I am told dares to speak what he thinks is right and best for his country. He wanted to come here and tell this conference some of his own experiences and some of the things that he had learned, and he has written a book; but no, he was not appointed and he is kept away.

Here is what I rose to say, Mr. President: I am not going to detain the Senate, because the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] has suggested that he would like to have an executive session.

Mr. CURTIS. No, Mr. President; I think we will not have an executive session to-night, if the Senator wants to take a little more time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I will speak a little longer.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment? To-day I heard a farmer from Illinois say, while eating his dinner downstairs, that last year it took 9,000 bushels of corn to pay his taxes, and this year it took 21,000 bushels.

Mr. HEFLIN. What do you think of that, Senators?—and then the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], our genial friend and the splendid genius, goes to New York and entertains some of those swell high brows of the four hundred by talking about the agricultural bloc! Here is a farmer who says that it took 9,000 bushels of corn to pay his taxes last year, and nearly three times that amount, 21,000 bushels, this year. Why, these gentlemen who criticize us do not know anything at all about how the farmers of the country are suffering. Whenever I hear them criticize the agricultural bloc I feel like saying: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!"

Now, I desire to ask the question, Why it is that we are asked here now to postpone this foreign indebtedness to our Government of $10,000,000,000 until some indefinite time in the future? What Wall Street interest is it that wants to collect its private debt from Great Britain and France and other countries, and wants to sidetrack the obligations of the Government and postpone the payment of the interest on the indebtedness to the United States Government? What big special interest in this country is it that asks the Senate of the United States solemnly to sidetrack and postpone the collection of that debt or even the interest upon it in order that Wall Street may immediately press its claim and collect its private indebtedness.

Is the Government going into that sort of business? Is the Congress of the United States going to be smoke-screened in this fashion? Why is it that the Congress will postpone the day of collecting the interest upon this money when 500,000 ex-soldiers are out of employment and are suffering for the necessities of life? Why is it that we are asked to do this when the farmers of America are in such financial distress that they are not able to pay their taxes? The great sovereign State of Texas, by an act of the legislature last year, postponed for a time the payment of taxes because of the awful condition that was upon the people of that State.

Senators, the agricultural interests of America are sorely in need of money and credits to carry on their business.

Why should we, who stand here each day pleading for relief for the farmers of America, the merchants of America in the agricultural sections, the bankers of America in the agricultural sections—for they are all in the same boat and in dire distress—be called upon to postpone the pay day of even the interest upon $10,000,000,000 to some indefinite period, perhaps 25 years in the future? Why should we turn over to a commission of five men the authority to do that and surrender our right to pass on it, surrender our power to act upon it, not requiring it to be submitted for the approval of Congress? Why are we called upon to do that, Senators?

I want the opportunity to vote on the report of that commission. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], a Democrat, offered an amendment in the committee some days ago before the bill was reported out, suggesting that we have an opportunity to pass on the question and that the report be submitted to Congress. He offered an amendment of this sort here about a week ago or more, and to-day the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] made a speech along that line, and, I believe, has introduced an amendment of the same sort.

Senators, is not that the best course to pursue? Why not do that? You have heard and I have heard that there are about $5,000,000,000 owing to certain Wall Street interests, and if they can postpone the Government debt of $10,000,000,000, or even the payment of the interest upon it, then the Government being out of the way, these private interests will proceed to collect their money, and the Government, which owes an obligation to the ex-soldiers, who saved its life, 500,000 of whom are in distress to-day, can patiently wait until Wall Street is paid before attempting to collect its debts.

I told you once before, Senators, about an ex-Congressman telling me that he saw in Cleveland, Ohio, some of these brave boys walk up to the stage in a theater where they had collected old coats for ex-service men in distress. He said, "The tears came in my eyes as I saw those boys going down the aisle getting an old coat, and I thought of how they stood on the battlefields of France and fought for my country." Yet here we are called upon to lodge in the hands of five men authority to reduce the interest rate or not collect it until some 25 years or more in the future and to postpone the payment of any part of the principal.

Senators, are you ready to turn over to a commission of five men to be appointed by the President power to act in this important matter without requiring that the proposed settlement be submitted for the approval of Congress? I am not.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. CURTIS. I will withhold the motion and yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I merely wish to obtain the floor in order that I may proceed to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia is recognized. Does he yield to the Senator from Kansas to move that the Senate take a recess at this time?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the Senator's purpose, I presume, to discuss the pending measure.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator from Georgia if, when he takes the floor to-morrow morning, he will permit me to submit a report from a committee which I am very anxious to present.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I renew my motion that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 27, 1922, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 26, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God Thou art the Ancient of Days and from everlasting to everlasting. Our poverty is expressed so often in our countless needs. Then enable us to welcome into our hearts divine sovereignty that our lives shall overflow with service, sympathy, and love. More and more teach us the relative importance of things eternal and things material. We ask Thee to give life and quality to every attribute, experience, and hope that we possess. Impart unto us wisdom and courage to carry forward our daily tasks. But never fail to give us strength to accept humbly and hopefully life's keenest sorrows that they may bring us honor, incorruption, and eternal life. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COINAGE OF A GRANT SOUVENIR GOLD DOLLAR.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 6119, and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and move to concur in the Senate amendments to the bill H. R. 6119, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6119) for the coinage of a Grant souvenir gold dollar in commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, late President of the United States.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

ANTILYNCHING BILL.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13, the antilynching bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13, the antilynching bill. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "ayes" appeared to have it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 26, noes 23.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those favoring the motion will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 246, nays 101, answered "present" 3, not voting—80, as follows:

Mr. KNUTSON with Mr. SABATH.
Mr. BUTLER with Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

Mr. DUNBAR. Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw my vote of "yea" and to be recorded as "present," as I am paired.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 13, the antilynching bill, with Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas in the chair.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, as I recall the parliamentary situation, the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] had been recognized and is entitled to the floor for five minutes and can not be displaced.

The CHAIRMAN. Just before the committee rose last evening the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] offered a motion, which was read. Thereupon the committee rose without debate. Now the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] offers a motion which is preferential.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LONDON. I desire to make a point of order against section 7 of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. Must that point of order be urged now or can it be urged at the time of the consideration of the amendment by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order should be made now, or reserved.

Mr. LONDON. Then I reserve a point of order against section 7 of the proposed amendment.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Minnesota had been recognized for five minutes and then he moved that the committee rise. Is he not entitled to recognition now?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that having offered his motion, which in its nature was not preferential, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] or any other gentleman would be entitled to recognition to offer a preferential motion, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] now submits a preferential motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think the point of order had better be disposed of now.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make his point of order with reference to section 7 of the bill?

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, section 7 presents to the House an entirely new proposition, which has nothing whatever to do with the bill under discussion.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman observed that that section is in the original bill?

Mr. LONDON. Does the gentleman mean in the canceled part of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Yes. So that it is germane to the bill.

Mr. LONDON. I did not notice that. I was dealing with the bill as reported by the committee, and I understand that we now have the bill as reported by the committee before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York will please state his point of order.

Mr. LONDON. My point of order is that section 7 is not germane unto the bill under discussion, which deals with the subject of lynching. Section 7 deals with an entirely different branch of the criminal law. It reads:

SEC. 7. That any act committed in any State or Territory of the United States in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, which act constitutes a crime under the laws of such State or Territory, shall constitute a like crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, punishable in like manner as in the courts of said State or Territory, and within the period limited by the laws of such State or Territory, and may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States, and upon conviction the sentence executed in like manner as sentences upon convictions for crimes under the laws of the United States.

It deals with a subject that has nothing to do with lynching, and is not germane to the bill or to any part thereof.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will look at the original bill he will find the same section in the original bill. The amendment which is now offered is offered as a substitute for the original bill. Certainly the section, which was in the original bill, makes this section germane.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is section 15 of the original bill.

Mr. MANN. There is no question about its being germane.

Mr. LONDON. The House has before it the substitute.

Mr. MANN. No; the House has before it the original bill with the substitute recommended by the committee as an amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota for the entire original bill.

Mr. LONDON. Is it the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois that my point of order is not well taken?

Mr. MANN. It is clearly not well taken. I wish it were.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York insist on his point of order?

Mr. LONDON. In view of the opinion expressed by the gentleman from Illinois I do not insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York withdraws his point of order. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] moves to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in brief, this bill proposes the prosecution in Federal courts of citizens of the States, of officers of the States, and of governmental subdivisions of the States for the violation of congressional edict with reference to mob violence inflicted within a State as a punishment for, or to prevent the commission of, some actual or supposed crime, a bill to confer upon the Federal Government jurisdiction to punish murder committed within a State.

Mr. Chairman, it does not lie within the constitutional power of the Congress to enact such legislation as is here proposed. This bill violates not only the letter of the Constitution but the governmental policy which it embodies. It violates the fundamental laws of government, which have been discovered by the actual experience of men in the operation of government. And, further, as a matter of administrative policy this proposed legislation, if enacted and held constitutional, on the one hand would encourage the crimes most provocative of mob violence and on the other hand it would weaken the sense of local responsibility which in the very nature of things must be depended upon to suppress that offense. Upon these grounds we challenge this bill. We also challenge the mob spirit which is behind this bill.

This bill can not pass this House unless it is put through by that same spirit which inspires the mob when, backed by the courage of numbers, it crushes through the legal barriers which deny the right to proceed and does an unlawful thing. The difference is that that thing is done in passion, while this is to be done deliberately as a matter of political expediency. I submit that this bill has incorporated therein provisions which no lawyer in this House or elsewhere can defend, either upon constitutional grounds or of sound governmental policy, and but few, if any, have reputations so poor or so well established that they will hazard them in the attempt. Yet you will be asked to pass the bill. They whisper in your ears "political expediency," and ask you to yield to it. That is the same whisper which comes to the ear of the sheriff when the mob is battering at the jail door.

To-day the Constitution of the United States stands at the door, guarding the governmental integrity of the States, the plan and the philosophy of our system of Government, and the gentleman from Missouri, rope in hand, is appealing to you to help him lynch the Constitution.

THE EFFECT OF CONGRESSIONAL INDORSEMENT.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the effect of this bill, if adopted, even if declared unconstitutional, would be to mark, in so far as the expression of legislative judgment and will is concerned and in so far as that expression would reflect the public attitude and direct public inclination, incomparably the farthest advance toward the obliteration of the States as independent governmental agencies of the people which has yet been registered by any expression of legislative or public attitude. The Congress has not only the responsibility for legislation, but in the very nature of things the responsibility, in a large measure, of leadership of public opinion with regard to governmental policy. Party policy and political expediency in all Governments controlled by parties are permitted to influence much of the mass of current legislation. But when the matter under consideration goes to the fundamentals of government, as this does, as distinguished from the policy of government, it carries a challenge to the conscience of the legislator, an appeal to his fidelity, to the larger duty to his country, which will not tolerate regard for political expediency.

WOULD DESTROY THE SENSE OF LOCAL RESPONSIBILITY.

How can it be controverted that this proposed intervention of the Federal Government, directed against local power, supplanting and superseding the sovereignty of the States, would tend to destroy that sense of local responsibility for the protection of person and the administration of justice, from which sense of local responsibility alone protection and governmental efficiency can be secured among free peoples?

REDUCES STATES TO GOVERNMENTAL VASSALAGE.

There is another important consideration. This bill, challenging as it does the relative governmental efficiency of the States and the integrity of purpose of their governmental agencies and of their people, placing the Federal Government, as it does, in the attitude of an arbitrary dictator assuming coercive powers over the States, their officers, and their citizens in matters of local police control, would do incomparable injury to the spirit of mutual respect and trustful cooperation between the Federal Government and the States and their people essential to the efficiency of government. As a precedent, this bill, establishing the principles which it embodies and the congressional powers which it assumes to obtain, would strip the States of every element of sovereign power, control, and final responsibility for the personal and property protection of its citizens, and would all but complete the reduction of the States to a condition of governmental vassalage awaiting only the full exercise of the congressional power. I challenge the proponents of this bill to controvert that statement.

Gentlemen, I should apologize to the House for not having proceeded at once to the discussion of the constitutional questions involved, but we desire it to be clearly understood in the beginning that while this bill is challenged because it is without constitutional warrant, because it violates the fundamental principles and philosophy of government from which our Constitution draws its vitality, and because, in the general governmental policy which it embodies, it disregards the lessons taught by the actual experience of men in the realm of government. It is further challenged because it would tend in a contrary direction from the objective which it professes to have. Under ordinary conditions the establishment of absence of constitutional power to legislate would settle the matter. But, unfortunately, this is political legislation, and I fear the obligation to defend the Constitution is resting lightly on the shoulders of many Members. The great principles of government embodied in our system are in danger of being forgotten in the presence of the political exigency.

I lay down this proposition: If this bill is sound in the governmental policy which it undertakes to embody, then our whole plan of government, which the judgment of men everywhere accords first place among the masterpieces of the world's constructive statesmanship, is fundamentally unsound.

Gentlemen, there is very much more involved here than that which is carried in the language of this bill. The more you study this bill and contemplate the consequences of congressional indorsement upon governmental policy, regardless of the question of constitutionality, the more importance will your judgment attach to the responsibility of the Congress in this matter. Let no man imagine that in the present state of public opinion, the present direction in which it is pressing, we will be able to turn back upon the course along which this bill gives us direction if we add to the pressure of public attitude the weight of congressional approval of this sort of measure. There is no use deceiving ourselves about that.

Gentlemen, it is not proposed by this bill to negative discriminatory State action merely; it is not even merely to oust the States from final police control and responsibility within their respective borders, but that the Federal Government shall go further and lay its hands in coercive power upon the governmental machinery of the States themselves as such and upon their officers as officers of the States and upon their citizens as citizens of the States and in matters clearly within the realm of police control undertake to compel them by Federal force to carry out the edict of the Congress with regard to local police control. Do this and you take from the States such inherent elements of sovereignty, of dignity, of final governmental responsibility as to make it absurd longer to talk about the State being a sovereign unit of government. How can a State be sovereign when there is held over it the uplifted lash of the Federal Congress? What would be left? Put this on the statute books, if you please. You are welcome to all of the political benefits you will get from it. You will find that there is somebody else to whom you have to answer in this country besides this little handful of agitators, who have scared you to death.

FEDERAL POWERS CLAIMED.

Sirs, it must be conceded that if the Federal Government can punish each of five individuals who constitute a mob or riotous assemblage, as is provided in this bill, it can inflict punishment if the offense were committed by one individual acting alone. If the Federal Government can punish for murder committed within a State, as is proposed by this bill, it can punish for all offenses committed against the person, from murder to simple assault. Is not that a sound proposition? If the Federal Government can punish for murder, for a physical offense, it can punish for every offense committed against property within a State.

If the Federal Government can enter that field, superseding State control, it can oust the State and occupy the whole field. And that is the power that they are claiming for the Federal Government, these gentlemen who are supporting this bill. When they say that the Federal Government has not that power, they admit that the Federal Government has not the power to enact this bill.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. If the gentleman is familiar with the hearings before the Committee on the Judiciary at the time that the bill was before that committee, he will recall that the question was asked Col. Goff, the Assistant Attorney General, whether if this bill were constitutional and the Federal Government had control of individual action, which heretofore had always been in the forum of the States, it would be possible for the Federal Government to punish embezzlement and larceny and assault and battery, and that Col. Goff replied that it would.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for calling my attention to it. If this bill is sound as a legislative premise, that conclusion is sound. You can not escape it; but his conclusion does not support the premise; it destroys it. Yet you are asked to pass this bill. I do not want to be offensive, but I say to you that you can not pass this bill unless you pass it under the influence of the same spirit which this bill denounces, viz, the mob spirit. You say that the folks down in the South are not doing this thing fast enough, and the folks in the South say the officers are not doing this thing fast enough, and you each get ropes and they go after the criminal and you go after the Constitution. [Laughter and applause.]

If it is lawful for the Federal Government to levy a penalty against a county as provided in this bill, merely because mob violence may have occurred in that county resulting in death, or that the person afterwards killed may have been transported across the county, it can levy a penalty against each county for every offense committed within it by any individual citizen against the person or the property of any other individual citizen whether the county officer knew a thing about it or not. Here is what these modern solons are claiming was written into the Constitution by the fourteenth amendment: That the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution gave to the Federal Government the power to levy a penalty against every county for every offense. They must do that or they can not support that clause of this bill. Now, you mark it, when they get up here——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course the gentleman would limit that to matters relating to extending the denial of the equal protection laws if——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Oh, if Congress can do what is tried to be done in the second section of this bill, trying to expand the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution by legislative enactment so that it will have a basis upon which to rest the legislative enactment——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is by definition.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; by definition. The States ceded to the Congress a definite power over them. Now, the Congress come in, the recipient of the power, and tries by definition to spread out its power so as to do what the Constitution will not let it do. There is not a thing in the fourteenth amendment about prohibiting mob violence, nothing about five persons, nothing about physical violence, nothing about property. The provisions are general.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman concede that there is power in the Congress to pass affirmative legislation for the enforcement of the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Or is it merely a negative passive assertion of right?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No; Congress has the power——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am speaking now specifically in reference to the equal protection laws.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If the gentleman will excuse me, I will discuss that in a few minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. The fourteenth amendment was a prohibition against a State's denial, while this bill is predicated not upon the denial by the State but upon the action of five individuals. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not only is that true, but Congress in this particular instance is undertaking to enact a municipal code to define offenses and provide for their punishment, which the Supreme Court has said Congress can not do.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I prefer not to yield, because I have in mind to discuss these matters in some order.

CONTROL OVER OFFICERS.

If this bill is constitutional Congress can provide the conditions under which the governors of the several States will be required to call out the militia of the State to defend the person or the property of the citizens of the State, and could provide for the trial and punishment of the governor, through criminal proceedings in the Federal court, and could send the governor of a State to the Federal penitentiary for a violation of the legislative will and edict of Congress with regard to the protection of the persons or property of his own people.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I should prefer very much no to do so.

Mr. STEVENSON. I just wanted to interpose——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. In relation to the fact this bill itself as written provides for that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I was just going to call the attention of the House to that. I am much obliged to the gentleman.

NOT COORDINATION BUT SUBJUGATION.

This is the important thing about this bill. It does not propose in terms or principle merely an extension of Federal activity through Federal machinery acting in harmony with, in respectful attitude toward and in governmental cooperation with, the States. It is a new sort of thing. This bill proposes the direct and humiliating governmental vassalage of the States, and you can not make anything else out of it. Never before in the history of this Government, in so far as I know, has any group of lawyers in Congress or out of it claimed any such power or favored its exercise. What sort of a governmental mess will we have in this country if we embark upon this sort of a legislative policy? You are the judges of your constitutional powers; the Supreme Court decisions, when clear and established, mark the outer boundary line of congressional action, but they do not relieve the conscience of the Congressman. You must pass upon your constitutional power to legislate, and I challenge you to-day under your official oaths to the exercise of that judgment. You sit here as the highest court in the land to determine the issues of your constitutional powers to enact this bill.

If there was not a single decision from the Supreme Court against the constitutionality of this proposition, there is not a man sitting here—let us be honest about it, man to man—who will assert that at any time of this country's history there ever was a moment when one single State would have yielded to the Federal Government such power as they assert in this bill rests in the Federal Government. There is not one single thing in the political history of this country, nothing in its philosophy of government, and not one word in the contemporaneous discussion of the fourteenth amendment to justify such a conclusion.

I make this statement, too, gentlemen: I have as much respect for the Supreme Court as anybody, but if the Supreme Court had decided that such powers as are here claimed were conferred by the fourteenth amendment we could not indorse the decision. We are guardians of the Constitution and of the integrity of the States. The Supreme Court is not the keeper of the congressional conscience. But the decisions of the Supreme Court are against this proposition.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTIONS INVOLVED.

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the patience and the manifest interest with which the Members of the House have followed the statement of the general propositions which are involved in this matter. I beg now to direct your attention more particularly to the constitutional questions which are involved. In doing so I shall not enter upon an academic discussion of the origin or extent of the Federal powers. It is well understood that prior to the adoption of the fourteenth and contemporaneous amendments no claim was made that the Federal Government possessed any power whatever to protect the civil rights of individuals. That responsibility has always been with and yet remains with the States.

It is also well understood, of course, that as between the States and the Federal Government the Federal Government comes from the States and not the States from the Federal Government, and that all governmental powers not delegated to the Federal Government are reserved to the States and to the people. The adoption of the fourteenth amendment in no sense altered that relationship. The Supreme Court in its judgment rendered in the Slaughterhouse case (16 Wall.), the first of the great decisions construing the fourteenth amendment, said:

SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASE.

It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that prior to the adoption of the recent amendments no claim or pretense was set up that those rights (rights of citizens) depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States. * * * But with the exception of these and a few other restrictions the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitution and legislative power of the States without that of the Federal Government. "Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, * * *" the court asks, "to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?"

The court answers its own query that there was not such a purpose.

Continuing, the court says:

* * * When the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character, when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other and of both of these Governments to the people; the argument—illustrating what could be done under such a power, as I have undertaken to illustrate what could be done under this bill—has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Mr. Chairman, there can be no question as to the soundness of that conclusion. The people never would have ratified a constitutional amendment conferring any such power as this bill seeks to have the Federal Government exercise. Gentlemen, I submit to your judgment, what sort of a legislative propostion could go forth more completely—to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character?

The court said it had a force that was irresistible—in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt. We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.

The opinion was written within three years after Mr. Thad. Stevens put the fourteenth amendment through this House. The Supreme Court, after mature consideration, said it was convinced no such result was intended by Congress or by the legislatures of the States which ratified the amendment. This court sustains what I said a few moments ago, and it was speaking right after the adoption. Here is what the Supreme Court said in concluding its opinion:

* * * we do not see in those amendments any purpose to destroy the main features of the general system.

What would the court have said if it had read this bill? What feature of the general system will be left if you establish the principle of this bill, if you establish as a principle of government in this country that the Federal Government shall stand with the uplifted lash of congressional enactment over every officer of the State? What would you have left under our system? You are welcome, gentlemen, to all the glory that you will get from putting this sort of thing on the statute books of the country. It will be a fine thing for your children to read in the days that are to come that "My daddy on this bill answered 'aye' on the vote when it came." But this is not merely the enactment of a law. This is dynamiting the governmental structure. [Applause.] That is what it is, and if you folks show the people that this is the thing to do they will bring in some more dynamite. [Applause.]

In the early seventies the carpetbagger was in his glory, but still he had some sense left. I do not say you folks were alone to blame. We were all to blame for the situation that existed. But they had some excuse in that day for going crazy.

You have not got any now. [Applause.] I read again from the Slaughterhouse case:

Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government.

You will observe it says "our statesmen." I say "our Congressmen," but there is no reflection meant. I hope you will all be statesmen this time. And remember that this is the Supreme Court that is speaking about this thing, not some fellow reading a lot of stuff from some propagandist. [Laughter.]

But no power—

to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceding to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character.

Among all the powers exercised by the States none is more general, ordinary, or fundamental than the police power. This bill undertakes to do the identical thing which the Supreme Court in its first pronouncement upon the fourteenth amendment said can not be done, and was not intended to be done, by those who proposed and by those who ratified the fourteenth amendment.

Gentlemen, draw the picture in your mind of a United States marshal putting shackles on the arms of the governor and pulling him out of the mansion of the people of the State and dragging him off to a Federal tribunal to answer for something that he is alleged to have failed to do with reference to the protection of the people who elected him to office. You can not do it. You can not get the Supreme Court, you can not get a district court, to hold this thing constitutional.

But no power—

Says the court—

to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character.

I am quoting from the court, remember. I am quoting from the court, and it is making my argument for me. The police power is the most ordinary power that a State exercises.

THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT—WHAT WAS INTENDED.

Now, here is the best authority on earth as to what was intended. And he was a man who did not love the South. It is Mr. Thad. Stevens, of Pennsylvania.

He was the acknowledged leader in the passage of the resolution through the House submitting the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution. In his discussion of the first section of that amendment he disclosed the object had in mind, namely, the conferring of power upon the Federal Government to negative discriminatory legislation on the part of the State against people of color. A number of States had enacted such legislation as a part of the governmental feud growing out of the period of reconstruction. Such legislation was not confined, however, to the South. I am advised that even the State of Ohio had a "black code." I shall quote from Mr. Stevens as to the cause which prompted the submission of and the object sought to be attained by the adoption of the first section of the fourteenth amendment, the section under which warrant for this proposed legislation is claimed:

* * * The Constitution limits only the action of Congress, and is not a limitation on the States. This amendment supplies that defect, and allows Congress to correct the unjust legislation of the States, so far that the law which operates upon one man shall operate equally upon all. Whatever law punishes a white man for a crime shall punish the black man precisely in the same way and to the same degree.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD the place from which he takes that quotation, the page of the Congressional Globe, or whatever it is?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman said that he would not find it possible in his statement before the House to cite all his authorities.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman put his citations in the RECORD as a part of his speech?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. In the quotation from Mr. Stevens did I understand the gentleman to read his statement to the effect that Congress could correct State legislation that denied equal protection of the law?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. To correct its effect, that Congress be given the power to deny the States the right to legislate in discrimination.

Mr. REAVIS. Of course, legislation denying the equal protection of the law would be held unconstitutional without congressional action?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The courts would take care of that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But gentlemen are proposing under that section of the fourteenth amendment not the exercise of the power to negative discriminatory acts on the part of the State but to enact a part of a municipal code, for Congress to do it to punish one citizen of a State, under a law enacted by the Congress, for a crime committed against another citizen of the same State. Such a thing as is proposed by this bill clearly was not had in contemplation when the amendment was submitted or when it was ratified, even in those times when the shadows of a great conflict still hung over the land and prejudice and passion too often wrought confusion in the judgment of our statesmen.

The fourteenth amendment did not undertake to create any additional guaranties as among the citizens of the State.

Not only does the language of the fourteenth amendment not express such a purpose, as was held by the Supreme Court in the Slaughterhouse case and in all the subsequent decisions, but legislative history affirmatively shows that the identical proposition to confer such power was proposed when the fourteenth amendment was being prepared for submission and was rejected by this House. I quote the rejected resolution:

Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper to secure to the citizens of each State all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States, and to all persons in the several States equal protection of the right of life, liberty, and property.

If that proposition had been adopted instead of the section which was adopted, then the enactment of this bill would be within congressional power, but the people who then constituted the membership of this House had too much appreciation of the importance of preserving our general plan of government even to submit it to the States.

The part of the section under consideration which was submitted and which is now a part of the Constitution, the part from which legislative warrant for this bill is claimed, is as follows:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

THE CRUIKSHANK CASE.

The next of the leading cases bearing upon the power of the Federal Government to punish individuals for wrongs committed against other individuals, as is proposed in this bill, is United States v. Cruikshank et al., decided in 1875.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman insert his citations in his printed speech?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes. The Cruikshank case, decided in 1875, is found in Ninety-second United States, 542.

This case arose under the sixth section of the act of May 31, 1871, known as the enforcement act, which, in part, is as follows:

If two or more persons shall band or conspire together, * * * with intent to violate any of the provisions of this act * * * or intimidate any citizen with intent to prevent or hinder his free exercise and enjoyment of any right or privilege granted or secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States * * * shall be held guilty of felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, at the discretion of the court. * * *

This, in effect, is the law to-day.

Cruikshank and associates were charged in the District Court of Louisiana with engaging in a conspiracy in violation of this section, and were convicted. Upon review by the Supreme Court it was held that the fourteenth amendment does not undertake to create any additional guaranty as among the citizens of the States.

I quote briefly:

The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which precedes it, * * * add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. * * * Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there—

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] to the contrary notwithstanding.

The next decision to which I desire to direct your attention is United States v. Harris (106 U. S., p. 629). I call special attention to this case, because it was a lynching case. In this particular case a mob took the prisoners away from the deputy sheriff. It is on all fours, as we would say if we were discussing this matter before a court.

Harris and 19 others were indicted for taking from the custody of a deputy sheriff a number of persons. It was charged that the prisoners had—

"been duly arrested * * * were then and there in the custody of a deputy sheriff of said county * * * were entitled to due and equal protection of the laws thereof * * * that the said R. G. Harris and 19 others, naming them, with certain other persons * * * did then and there * * * unlawfully conspire together" and take these prisoners from the custody of the officers, "beating, bruising, wounding, and otherwise ill treating them, * * * contrary to the form of the statute,"—

And so forth, and charging conspiracy to hinder the deputy sheriff from safely keeping the prisoners. The same sort of indictment as would be drawn for an offense committed under this bill. This indictment was drawn under section 5519 of the Revised Statutes, of the act of 1871, which is very similar to the section under which the Cruikshank indictment was had, and is identical in legislative import with provisions in the bill under consideration.

It will be observed upon an examination of this indictment that in effect it charged the same offense as is defined in the last clause of section 3 of this bill under consideration, which undertakes to subject to Federal jurisdiction any citizen of a State guilty of taking a defendant from the custody of a State or municipal officer and inflicting death upon such person as a punishment for his crime.

Section 4 of this bill is identical in principle with the section under which this indictment was had. The opinon was rendered by Mr. Justice Woods, who, after disposing of the contentions of the Government with reference to the constitutionality of the action under other provisions of the Constitution, said:

It is, however, strenuously insisted that the legislation under consideration finds its warrant in the first and fifth sections of the fourteenth amendment. The first section declares * * * nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

After quoting the authorities in the Slaughterhouse case, the Cruikshank case, Virginia v. Rives, 100 U. S. 313, the court says:

These authorities show conclusively that the legislation under consideration finds no warrant for its enactment in the fourteenth amendment. * * * In the indictment in this case, for instance, which would be a good indictment under the law if the law itself were valid, there is no intimation that the State of Tennessee has passed any law or done any act forbidden by the fourteenth amendment. On the contrary, the gravamen of the charge against the accused is that they conspired to deprive certain citizens of the United States and of the State of Tennessee of the equal protection accorded them by the laws of Tennessee.

A remarkable thing about this bill is that it comes in here with the condemnation of the Supreme Court, in the clearest language, resting upon every provision, except possibly a part of one section.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I want to get clearly the gentleman's view of the constitutional provision. I have hesitated to interrupt him because he is making an interesting discussion. Is it the gentleman's view that the provisions of the Constitution which he is discussing and on which he says this is to be based—that these provisions are self-executing and can only be invoked for the purpose of holding the law of the State unconstitutional?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not say that they are entirely self-executing, because section 5 gives Congress the power to enact legislation, but only a certain sort of legislation.

I want to confine myself at this time to the section of the bill now under consideration. But I will say to the gentleman the Supreme Court holds that Congress can not enact such legislation as Harris was prosecuted under and which provided that if citizens acting in conspiracy attempt to deprive a person of any right under the Constitution they would be subject to punishment by the Federal Government.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I want to know—is the gentleman of the opinion that Congress does have the right by legislative action to deal with any State governmental agency when that agency does deprive——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think so; but if the gentleman will excuse me, I do not want to go into that now. I concede that, but the point I am trying to make is that Congress does not have the power to do what the committee has asked the Congress to do. That is the point I am trying to make.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I will.

Mr. REAVIS. The only thing Congress has the power to legislate on is not the individual but where the individual acts as the representative of the State and therefore binds the State. His act is the act of the State.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; when his act is the act of the State. At this time, gentlemen, I give notice that I shall contest the constitutionality of the entire provision in this bill undertaking to punish the officer.

Concluding, the court says:

It was never supposed that the section under consideration conferred on Congress the power to enact a law which would punish a private citizen for an invasion of the rights of his fellow citizen conferred by the State of which they were both residents on all its citizens alike. We have, therefore, been unable to find any constitutional authority for the enactment of section 5519 of the Revised Statutes. The decisions of this court above referred to leave no constitutional ground for the act to stand on.

That decision has never been overruled. In the light of that decision the main provisions of this bill stand forth not only in contempt of our plan of government, but in contempt of the clearest enunciation by the Supreme Court, where law and facts conspired to make the situation identical with that which would arise in prosecution under this bill if enacted.

THE CIVIL RIGHTS CASES.

Among the leading cases construing congressional power under the fourteenth amendment are the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3). Speaking of the prohibitions contained in the first section of the fourteenth amendment, the court says (p. 11):

It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States or which injures them in life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or which denies to any of them the equal protection of the law. * * * To adopt appropriate legislation for correcting the effects of such prohibited State laws and State acts and thus to render them effectually null, void, and innocuous. This is the legislative power conferred upon Congress, and this is the whole of it.

That is what the Supreme Court says about it.

And again the court says (p. 13):

* * * It is absurd to affirm that, because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the State without due process of law—

The Supreme Court says that it is absurd to hold that because the States are prohibited from denying due process of law that Congress can enact statutes under which the Congress would undertake to provide due process of law. Do gentlemen catch that distinction?

Mr. DEMPSEY. I understand perfectly when the gentleman is talking about the individual, but——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Let me get through with talking about the individual.

Mr. DEMPSEY. But the gentleman has not quoted any case yet which deals with an officer.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Of course I have not, but the gentleman must give me a little time in which to do that. Let me repeat again what the court says:

It is absurd to affirm that because the rights of life, liberty, and property (which include all civil rights that men have) are by the amendment sought to be protected against invasion on the part of the States without due process of law, Congress may therefore provide due process of law for their vindication in every case; and that because the denial by a State to any persons of equal protection of the laws is prohibited by the amendment, therefore Congress may establish laws for their equal protection.

The court says that sort of thing is absurd—the thing now attempted to be done by this bill. I do not say that it is absurd, because I have too much respect for you gentlemen, but the Supreme Court evidently did not feel that way. Then the court, as though in criticism of this pending proposition, says with reference to the matter then before it, which was the constitutionality of an act granting all citizens equal rights in hotels, inns, and so forth, without regard to color—

This is not corrective legislation; it is primary and direct; it takes immediate and absolute possession of the subject of the right of admission to inns, public conveyances, and places of amusement. It supersedes and displaces State legislation on the same subject or only allows it permissive force. It ignores such legislation and assumes that the matter is one that belongs to the domain of national legislation.

That is what they assume here. Why, if it belongs to the domain of national legislation to protect against mob violence, then it is within the domain of national legislation to protect against every sort of physical violence. You can not find one single word in the fourteenth amendment that draws the distinction. If it is within the domain of national legislation to protect persons, then it is within the domain of national legislation to protect property. What have you left then of the States? Nothing. This bill strikes at the very heart of State sovereignty and the sense of local responsibility. When you destroy these, what sort of protection will the people have who live in the communities?

You are going to understand this question better some day. Then you will say, "Well, I swear, I voted for that Dyer bill," or perhaps your little child will ask, "Papa, did you vote for the Dyer bill?" and you will answer, "No; I do not reckon I did. I did not look at the RECORD the next day, and the Clerk is always making mistakes." [Laughter.]

But, continuing with an examination of the authorities:

THE CASE OF JAMES v. BOWMAN.

In the case of James v. Bowman (190 U. S., 127) opinion by Mr. Justice Brewer, the authorities which I have quoted from were reviewed, approved, and it was again declared that Congress possesses no power under either the thirteenth, the fourteenth, or fifteenth amendments to enact such legislation as is here proposed for the protection of one citizen of a State against wrongs committed against his person or property by another.

Time will not permit an analytical discussion of the decisions in point. They are so definite and clear, however, that would seem unnecessary. Nor will Members of the House have an opportunity to examine them all before the vote shall have been reached, but if you will examine only this one decision, James against Bowman, there will be made manifest a lack of constitutional warrant for this bill, considered as a whole, pitiable in the extreme, and the lack of any basis upon which the belief that it exists, in good faith, can be claimed. I do not mean to be discourteous or offensive by that statement; but, gentlemen, this is a most remarkable procedure. A bill is brought into this House and you are asked to enact it into law, with the condemnation of the Supreme Court resting in the clearest language upon practically every one of its provisions.

THE RIGGINS CASE, 134 FEDERAL REPORTER.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to direct the attention of the House to one more determination arising under a state of facts most favorable to the theory of the proponents of this legislation. In 1904 Riggins was indicted with a number of coconspirators, including one Powell, under sections 5508 and 5509 of the Revised Statutes, for taking one Maples from the custody of the sheriff and a detachment of National Guard troops at Huntsville, Ala., and hanging him.

The six counts of the indictment covered every possible phase of the Government's case, charging the act to have been done because Maples was a Negro; that it was done in order to deprive him of his rights to protection, to an orderly trial, and so forth. The circuit court—opinion by Jones, district judge—held to the theory advanced by those who are supporting this bill and denied the application of the defendant for discharge on habeas corpus, made on the ground that the charge under which he was held constituted no offense against the laws of the United States. The opinion of the circuit court is very elaborate, covering 18 pages of the Federal Reporter. In view of the fact that the reasoning of the expounders of the Constitution who appeared before the Judiciary Committee to throw the light of their illuminating judgment upon that ancient document followed every turn and twist of the reasoning of the circuit court in this—the Riggins—case, and that this same circuit court, the same Judge Jones presiding, later in the Powell case, One hundred and fifty-first Federal Reporter, page 648, Powell having been jointly indicted with Riggins and procured a severance, reversed its holding theretofore made in the Riggins case, I shall quote from the Riggins opinion. Those of you who have examined the constitutional arguments—I mean the arguments with reference to the constitutionality of the proposed legislation—will be struck with the remarkable similarity between the argument of the court in the Riggins case and the argument made in favor of the constitutionality of this bill.

The court says:

When a private individual takes a person charged with crime from the custody of the State authorities to prevent the State from affording him due process of law and puts him to death to punish the crime and to prevent the enjoyment of such right, it is violent usurpation and exercise, in the particular case, of the very function which the Constitution of the United States itself, under this clause, directs the State to perform in the interest of the citizen. (Page 409, 134 Fed. Rep.)

A State officer in attempting to afford due process in a particular case is discharging a duty imposed upon him as the representative of the State by the Constitution of the United States for the benefit of its citizens. The prisoner also, while confined and being protected against lawless violence, that he may have a trial according to the law of the land, is in the exercise or enjoyment of a right given him by the Constitution. Congress may protect the right by protecting the performance of the duty, and the rights which flow from it, by declaring the violations of State laws on the subject constitute offenses against the United States (p. 411).

The constitutional right of the citizen can not bear fruit or ripen into the enjoyment of due process at the hands of the State if lawless outsiders prevent State officers from performing their duty concerning it. The right, privilege, or immunity of a citizen of the United States under this clause, which is to have his State give him the benefit of due process of law, therefore necessarily carries with it and includes in it the right, privilege, or immunity to enjoy freedom, exemption from lawless assault, which supervenes between the State and the performance of its duty, and by such violent interference prevents the citizen having, when the State is endeavoring to afford it, due process at the hands of the State (p. 413).

Continuing, the court says:

The court does not doubt that Congress has power to punish the acts charged in the indictment—that is, the act of taking a person from the custody of an officer and lynching him—and that sections 5508 and 5509 of the Revised Statutes apply to them and are "appropriate" legislation to that end. The result is that the writ must be discharged and the prisoner remanded to the custody of the marshal (p. 423).

Not only did the argument before the Judiciary Committee follow the reasoning in this case, but this bill clearly rests upon that reasoning. There is just one difficulty.

COURT REVERSES ITSELF.

The court which rendered this opinion later in the companion Powell case, the opinion by the same judge, reversed itself, and in that reversal was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. From this decision of the circuit court the Riggins case went to the Supreme Court. While application for discharge on habeas corpus was pending in the Supreme Court the Hodges case (203 U. S., 1), already referred to, came up from the State of Arkansas, and was decided by that court. In that opinion the Supreme Court adhered to the former holdings in the Harris and other cases and against the conclusions reached by the circuit court in the Riggins case. In the most comprehensive language it redeclared that no power resides in the Federal Government to punish one citizen of a State for acts of violence committed against another. Shortly after the Hodges case was decided by the Supreme Court the case of Powell, who had been indicted jointly with Riggins, came before the circuit court, which had decided the Riggins case, by the same process and under identically the same circumstances of fact and of law as the Riggins case had come. As stated, Judge Jones in this case also rendered the opinion for the court, accepting the decision of the Supreme Court in the Hodges case as a mandate to him not to follow his former holding in the companion Riggins case, reversed his position taken in the Riggins case, and ordered the indictment against Powell quashed and the defendant discharged.

But the matter did not stop there. From this decision in the Powell case the Government appealed to the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court, with the issue squarely before it, upon the authority of the Hodges case, with the identical argument made that is made here, affirmed the decision of the circuit court, quashing the indictment and discharging the defendant Powell (212 U. S., 564). This case was reargued before the Supreme Court, and the court adhered to its former holding.

Thus the Supreme Court of the United States again, with only the one issue pending, refused to accept the theory here advanced that the taking of a prisoner from the custody of the State and putting him to death gives to the Federal court jurisdiction.

PENALIZING THE COUNTIES.

Mr. Chairman, I desire next to direct attention to section 5 of this act, under which it is sought to impose penalties upon counties in which lynchings occur, and also upon those counties through which the intended victim may be transported prior to execution, and so forth.

Of course the Federal Government has no power to levy a tax upon a State or upon any of its subdivisions. The power to tax is the power to destroy. The nonexistence of such a Federal power is apparent from an examination of the Constitution; but in view of the remarkable position taken here with regard to the Federal powers over the States, we are fortunate that the matter has been too often decided to be open to question now.

Aside from the matter of taxation, that section, in short, is an arrogant, impudent assumption of a nonexistent police power over the States. It is true that a few of the State governments where general police power resides, of course, in the extreme exercise of that power have enacted such legislation, but it is doubtful if a group of American lawyers, in Congress or out of it, ever before claimed such a power for the Federal Government or indicated a willingness to have it exercise such a power even if it possessed it. This identical point has often been decided by the highest courts of the land. I quote only from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations:

COOLEY ON CONSTITUTIONAL LIMITATIONS.

In the American constitutional system the power to establish the ordinary regulations of police has been left with the individual States, and it can not be taken from them, either wholly or in part, and exercised under legislation of Congress. Neither can the National Government, through any of its departments or officers, assume any supervision of the police regulations of the States. All that the Federal authority can do is to see that the States do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any authority which the Constitution has confided to the Nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution (p. 831).

Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen of the House desire to pursue the inquiry further, I beg to suggest an examination of City of Chicago against Cement Co., reported in One hundred and seventy-eighth Illinois, 372. In that case the nature of the power, which, of course, is a police power, and the origin of its exercise is discussed. It comes to us from the English system under which each member of the "hundred" was held responsible for the peace, good order, and security within the community.

DUTIES OF OFFICERS OF THE STATES AS PRESCRIBED IN THE BILL.

There is yet to be considered the provisions of the bill—section 3—prescribing the duties of the officers of the State. I direct your attention first to the part of the section which gives directions to State officers with reference to the detection and punishment of those who have been engaged in mob or riotous acts and provides penalties for noncompliance with the congressional mandate. It seeks to prescribe by a Federal code and compel by Federal prosecution observance by policemen, sheriffs, prosecuting attorneys, judges, and governors, of a policy and a standard of official efficiency in a given circumstance which is a proper standard, but one which only the State can prescribe. It is not the Federal Government's business to give direction to State officers with reference to detection and punishment of crimes which have already been committed by one citizen of a State against other citizens of the State. There is nothing in the Constitution which brings this character of offenses—mob violence—committed within a State against the person within the direct or indirect jurisdiction of the Federal Government as distinguished from the whole body of crimes denounced by State laws. If the Federal Government has this power when one man has been killed by five, it has a power which covers the whole field of police control and extends to the control of the State and municipal police personnel in the discharge of all their police duties. Not only does this section carry the assumption that Congress has jurisdiction over the subject matter, the legislative power to enact a criminal code governing the general discharge of police duties by State officers, but that it has the power of general administrative control over the law-enforcing machinery of the States as such. The authorities already quoted and the Constitution itself, shows the nonexistence of such a Federal power.

CONTROL OVER STATE OFFICERS.

Mr. Chairman, there now remains for consideration only the first part of section 3 of this bill, which is as follows:

That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death by any mob or riotous assembly, or who has any such person in his charge as a prisoner, who fails, neglects, or refuses to make all reasonable effort to prevent such person from being put to death * * * shall be punished—with a maximum penalty of $5,000 fine and five years in the penitentiary.

It is insisted by the proponents of this bill that Ex parte Virginia (100 U. S.) and Home Telephone Co. v. Los Angeles (227 U. S.) are authorities in point sustaining the constitutionality of this provision. Those decisions will be examined later. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that this provision has not heretofore fallen under the direct condemnation of the Supreme Court, for the very good reason, I apprehend, with due respect to the authors of this bill, that in all the history of fanatical and freak legislation in this country no such proposition as this has yet received legislative sanction. But since this provision has that position of relative advantage, is supported by the opinion of the Attorney General, and generally holds the strongest position in this bill, special consideration should be given to it. Before proceeding to an examination of the authorities just mentioned let us consider the Federal powers which this provision presupposes to exist.

It is not merely what is proposed to be done but what can be done, if that which is proposed may be done, which brings the constitutional question into clear development for examination.

There is no difference between the Federal power, whatever it may be, to prosecute a State officer in a Federal court for failure to protect against murder, and the power to prosecute and punish him under a penal code enacted by Congress for failure to protect against simple assault, and no difference between the Federal power required to punish for failure to protect the person and to punish for the failure to protect property. I assume nobody will deny that. The powers conferred by the fourteenth amendment are in general terms and cover, to whatever extent they go, both property and person. If the constitutional power is held by the Federal Government to do what is proposed in this provision referred to, it can provide for the punishment in a Federal court of police officers who fail to carry out the congressional edict to them with reference to the protection of the property on their "beats," and the prevention of all violence to persons, and so forth.

It can go up the line and establish congressional supervision over the governor of the State with reference to his official acts touching the protection of the person and property of his people. I assume nobody will challenge that statement. Under this identical provision as it stands, if constitutional, it would be possible to prosecute the governor of a State and send him to a Federal penitentiary for the violation of this congressional edict and direction with regard to his duty in the protection of the citizens of his own State. I realize this is not controlling if in fact the power were granted, but it is highly persuasive in resolving doubt in construction as to whether the States ever granted such power.

This is not a provision to negative discriminatory State action. It does not tend to preserve the harmony of the general plan of government. It tends to destroy it. That fact is also persuasive as against presumption that any such thing was intended or done. It seeks to invoke, and must depend for its constitutionality upon, the existence of a Federal power to supervise and overlord the agents of the State while acting as such, to enact a penal code which would hold them constantly under the controlling influence of a superior Federal authority, clothed with the power over every State officer to remove him from the discharge of the duties for which the people of the State had chosen him, and arraign him before a Federal court and possibly send him to the Federal penitentiary for something which he had failed to do touching his duties as a State officer.

21. That would be a power to destroy second only, if in fact not equal, to the power to destroy by taxation also carried in this bill. It is the power to strip the State of its executive personnel and, by a less certain inclusion, its legislative and judicial personnel also. But that is not all. A constitutional authority which would clothe the Federal Government with the power to enact and enforce laws of directory and mandatory control over the officers of the State, as is provided by section 3 of this bill, would unquestionably include the power to compel the State to create a constabulary personnel in number and qualification in accord with the legislatively expressed judgment of the Federal Congress necessary, in its judgment, to enforce the congressional interpretation of the equal protection clause of the Constitution. No less a constitutional power than that can support section 3, the provision of this bill under consideration. The Supreme Court has not, of course, established any such power as existing in the Federal Government. It can not declare it without being guilty of judicial brigandage. But that is the power they claim and must have in the Federal Government, else there is no warrant for section 3.

The language of the fourteenth amendment is plain. Its meaning is not obscure. To say that a State officer who violates a State law and a duty to his people, by reason of that fact comes under the superior jurisdiction of the Federal Government as against the State whose officer he is, on the theory that his act done against his public duty as an officer of the State is the act of the State, is the height of absurdity in construction and conclusion. When a State provides in its legislative, executive, and judicial branches for the equal protection of all its people, prescribes pains and penalties for the failure of its officer personnel to afford equal protection, in the event of a breach of duty by any of its officers there does not arise the fact of Federal jurisdiction or any assumption that its exercise is necessary or would be helpful.

If the Federal Government can supervise the official personnel of a State in order to secure "equal protection," it can create that personnel for the same purpose, and there ought to be no State governments. There can be no State. That is the direction in which this legislation leads. And that is its logical conclusion. Let nobody misunderstand that.

Whether considered from the standpoint of constitutionality, general governmental policy, or administrative expediency, its absurdity is the dominating characteristic of this bill.

Even if no guilt be attached and no conviction of the officer be had, this hazard of prosecution in a court, often many miles away, with the expense of lawyers' hire and the uncertainty of results, would stand as a peril over every man who bears the commission of a peace officer and as an insult to the State or to the municipality whose commission he bears. Yet this is the favorite section of those who urge this legislation and is the part of this bill which it is most insisted is constitutional. I beg you to have in mind the decisions of the Supreme Court with reference to the preservation of the harmony of our dual system of Government already quoted from while we proceed to a further examination with reference to this provision.

I quote again, the "due-process" and the "equal-protection" clauses of the fourteenth amendment are as follows:

Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the law.

We are now considering specifically whether the Congress has the power to provide penalties for the doing by a person who happens to be a State officer of that which is done, not for and under the authority of the State, but in violation of State law and State policy, for his failure to act for the State, on the theory that such act or omission against the law of the State is the act or failure to act of the State. The constitutional inhibition is against the State. It is understood, of course, that each of the States denounce and make criminal the acts and omissions of their officers here sought to be made punishable by the Federal Government.

As we have seen, the decisions all hold against the proposition that any power was by the fourteenth amendment conferred upon the Federal Government to punish the individual violating the civil rights of other individuals. The only circumstances consonant with reason, common sense, and with the repeated judicial constructions under which an officer can be punished under the constitutional inhibition contained in the fourteenth amendment against State action is that, and when the act of the officer is the act of the State. I submit as a matter of law and of common sense that when the individual who happens to be an officer acts against the State in violation of its laws, in disregard of its policy, like any other criminal, he is the enemy of the State. He can not in the doing of such an act be its agent and such an act can not be the act of the State. His act is the crime of an individual, and for such crime, like any other criminal, he is amenable to the State, not for which he has acted, but against which he has acted. This is the holding of the Supreme Court by unanimous decision in the Barney case, One hundred and ninety-third United States, in which case Chief Justice Fuller, speaking for the court, held against the jurisdiction of the Federal court on the ground that—

* * * in the present case defendants were proceeding not only in violation of provisions of the State law but in opposition to plain prohibitions—the defendants in this case being officials of the city of New York.

EX PARTE VIRGINIA.

I desire now to direct your attention to Ex parte Virginia, one of the two leading cases depended upon to support this section.

The facts, briefly stated, are that Judge Coles, county judge of Pittsylvania County, whose duty it was under the laws of Virginia to select a list of those who were to serve on the juries in that county during the succeeding 12 months, in the making up of said list excluded therefrom all colored persons, though legally qualified, because of their color.

He was indicted for having violated a Federal statute prohibiting such exclusion. The case came before the Supreme Court on application for writ of habeas corpus and certiorari, made on the ground that his act constituted no offense against the Federal Government. The Supreme Court held against his contention and that of the State of Virginia, intervener, and remanded Coles to the custody of the marshal.

There is nothing in the determination in Ex parte Virginia which supports any provision of this bill. There was no claim made that either State law or State policy had been violated. The State of Virginia intervened, claiming that its officer, the county judge under prosecution, in the doing of that for which he was being prosecuted, namely, excluding Negroes from the jury list of Pittsylvania County, was acting as an officer of Virginia, exercising official discretion in connection with the carrying out of the law of the State of Virginia.

The defendant, Judge Coles, made the same contention. At no time was it claimed by anybody that his act was in violation of the laws of Virginia. The Legislature of the State of Virginia, by resolution, had directed the State to intervene in that case. The title of the case as reported in the books is not Ex parte Coles but Ex parte Virginia. The State of Virginia did not repudiate Coles, but admitted, indorsed, and ratified his claim of right so to act.

In fact, Judge Coles had done a necessary act for the State, had put in motion, in so far as supplying jury material was concerned, the judicial machinery of the State of Virginia, in the county of Pittsylvania, which, under the impetus given by him, was to run for 12 months. As an agent of the State, he made the State dispense to litigants during the 12 months jury panels, selected with such bias against the blacks as to deny to all of them, as contrasted with their white neighbors, the "equal protection of the law." He put out of balance the scales of justice in his county, so that the judicial machinery could not afford "equal protection." At least, so runs the Government's theory in such cases.

There is no analogy between this case and the case presupposed by this bill, where an officer would act not only without any claim or even color of right so to act for the State but act against the direct penal provisions of the State laws.

THE TELEPHONE CASE.

Let us consider the other of their leading cases—Home Telephone Co. against the City of Los Angeles.

The city of Los Angeles held from the State of California the general power to fix the rates of telephone service charge. The city, acting through its officers, fixed a confiscatory rate in violation of both the State and the Federal Constitution. This rate was sought to be enjoined in the Federal court. The jurisdiction of the Federal court was challenged on the ground that if the rate was confiscatory, which would give the Federal court jurisdiction, it was also in violation of the State constitution, which fact would deny such jurisdiction to that court, because, as was contended, an act done in violation of the constitution of the State could not be the act of the State. The court held that since the city of Los Angeles had from the State the general power to fix telephone rates and its officers were acting under color of that authority, the rates being actually in operation, its act through such officers was the act of the State within the meaning of the fourteenth amendment. It was a proceeding to nullify and to stop the hurtful effect of an act of a unit of the State government, actually governing within certain territorial and governmental limits, and in this particular instance was assuming to act and was acting as a unit of the State government under its general and special powers delegated to it by the State, and was actually taking by confiscation the property of the telephone company.

As a matter of law and of fact, the city of Los Angeles had performed a governmental act as a governmental subdivision of the State. It actually possessed, by delegation from the State, in point of degree, within the territorial limits of that city, all the governmental power possessed by the State to fix telephone rates. This rate was fixed in so far as procedure taken by the officers of that city was concerned in the manner provided by law. It was being effectually enforced by the coercion of governmental power put into operation by such officers and operating in the usual way. There was nothing irregular about the method of official procedure. The only real issue before the court was whether the fact that the rate, being also in violation of the State constitution, deprived the Federal court of original jurisdiction to prevent the taking of the property, which was actually in progress, of the telephone company in violation of the "due process" clause of the Federal Constitution.

The court, in holding against the contention of the city, reasoned that to hold such an act not the act of the State, within the meaning of the Federal Constitution, and in the sense that would deny original jurisdiction to the Federal court, would be equivalent to holding, not only in this case but in every case, that Federal jurisdiction would not attach, in the first instance, as against a State violating any provision of the Federal Constitution, provided the State have in its own constitution a provision identical with the provision of the Federal Constitution which it was also violating.

To this limitation upon the exercise of Federal jurisdiction the Supreme Court declared itself unwilling to agree, citing numerous decisions in support of its holding.

The officers in this case were acting under color of authority and in line of official duty. Their act was not personal but official; not contrary to any penal law. Their act was in fact, and the Supreme Court held in law, done for and as agents of the city of Los Angeles.

There is nothing novel in the court's determination of the issue involved in this case. There is not the slightest analogy between the issues of fact, no similarity between the relationship with or the attitude and the action of the officers toward their principal and toward their official duties in that case and those which would be in issue in a prosecution under this section. This section is directed against a personal crime, over which it is sought to establish Federal jurisdiction on the theory that a direct personal crime committed against the State, done under no color or claim of right granted by the State to do it, is nevertheless the act of the State.

The effect of the charge in the Federal indictment under this clause would be to charge that the defendant owed a duty under State law as an agent of the State to act for the State, to do a certain thing, and that he had failed so to act for the State but had acted against it, against its peace and dignity, and against its laws made and provided.

The Supreme Court has never held in any case, whatever may have been its obiter expressions, that an official of the State who disregards his duty to execute the laws of the State, and, on the contrary, actually violates them, in such a circumstance does the act of the State. Nor can any such decision ever be made by the court without violating common sense, the rules of construction, and a fundamental principle of government which has received the most general recognition—the principle which declares that the offending official does not act as the agent of the State.

If the principle noted is to be no longer applied, then not only is every government, whether of a State or of the subdivision of a State, liable to be penalized because of the misconduct of its officials, but the process of penalizing may logically be carried far enough to destroy it. The principle mentioned has been repeatedly announced by text writers and by courts. It is established. Speaking generally with regard to the bill, and summing up, as we lawyers say, not only has the Supreme Court repeatedly held against the principles embodied in this bill, but has held unconstitutional former acts of the Congress almost identical in language with that contained in provisions of this bill.

EXISTING LAW PROTECTS ALL CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS.

I doubt, gentlemen, that the history of legislation holds a parallel to this procedure. A bill is brought in here which carries provisions to punish individuals who engage in lynching, framed in almost identical language with section 5519 of the second civil rights act, which section was held unconstitutional in the Harris case (106 U. S.), a lynching case, the holding in which case has been followed in an unbroken line of decisions, including the comparatively recent Riggins, Hodges, and Powell cases. It carries a provision to levy fines against counties, the extreme exercise of the most general police power, which power all authorities agree is not possessed by the Federal Government. It carries a provision to punish crimes committed by State officers against the State, on the theory that such criminal acts are the acts of the State. A thing which makes this procedure even the more remarkable is the fact that there is now a Federal statute in effect which is as broad in its application and in its protections against wrongs inflicted by mobs and other conspirators as are all the rights and privileges conferred by the entire Constitution. It is section 5508, which contains this language:

> If two or more persons conspire to injure, oppress, threaten, or intimidate any citizen in the free exercise or enjoyment of any right or privilege secured to him by the Constitution or laws of the United States * * * they shall be fined not more than $5,000 and imprisoned not more than 10 years, and shall, moreover, be thereafter ineligible to any office or place of honor, profit, or trust created by the Constitution or laws of the United States.

There is also section 5509, under which, if death results in the carrying out of the conspiracy, prosecution for murder could be had, provided, of course, there existed under the Constitution Federal jurisdiction.

There can not be enacted a constitutional law against mobs or any other conspiracy broader than that, and the Constitution can not be stretched to support an unconstitutional law, as is attempted by section 2 of this bill.

Since no right of the individual arising under the Constitution can be transgressed against by mobs or other conspirators which is not now protected by the act referred to, the converse is true, of course, that no right of the citizen which existing law does not protect as against conspirators is a right which he holds under the Constitution, and therefore can be protected by congressional enactment. I submit that as a sound proposition of law and of logic, and as of controlling force in any candid attempt at ascertainment of constitutional power and of legislative policy with reference to this matter.

It is not statute but constitutional warrant, from your position, which is needed, and that can not be had by the enactment of another unconstitutional statute.

Before concluding on this point I direct your attention to the fact that it was under these statutes just cited that the Riggins and the Powell prosecutions, referred to, were had. They were lynching cases. In the clearest, most definite sort of way, with only the one question involved, viz, the constitutional power to punish in the Federal court those engaged in a lynching, the Supreme Court held that no such power exists under the Constitution. As a matter of construction and of common sense, if the officer acts for the State and tries to afford protection, he can not be convicted in any jurisdiction. If he acts against the State and fails to try to protect, becoming a party to the crime, a conspirator with the mob, he could then be prosecuted in the Federal court under existing law if there were any constitutional provision from which Federal jurisdiction could be gotten. This is the conclusion of the whole matter—the rights with regard to which this bill seeks to protect are not rights held under the Federal Constitution. The State never delegated to the Federal Government any power with reference thereto.

DANGER FROM CONGRESSIONAL INDORSEMENT.

I tell you very candidly, gentlemen, that I have no serious concern as to what the Supreme Court will do with this proposition, but I confess a deep concern as to what the Congress is going to do about it. I am concerned as to the inevitable effect which congressional indorsement of this principle will have upon the ever-increasing tendency toward concentration of governmental power in Washington and upon race agitation.

The objection to this bill which has been urged upon the ground that it is destructive of the power, the prestige, and the independent governmental responsibility and efficiency of the States is not based upon any abstract political doctrine or theory with regard to State rights. I submit that there is a demonstrated wisdom in our general plan of government. The reservation by the States of the general police power was not merely that the States may preserve their dignity and the pride of governmental importance. There was and is a more substantial reason.

It is a fact, not a theory merely, that since the formative period of government all progress in government has held to that general direction which places not the right to govern, but the necessity to govern, as close to the individual citizen as under all the circumstances it is practicable to place that responsibility. It is not merely the right of the people of the States to govern in matters of police control against which this bill offends. That is not important. It is against the necessity to govern that this bill offends, and grievously offends. That necessity is the one thing of paramount importance which must be preserved if governmental progress is to be maintained, and the grapple with governmental difficulties held close to the people as a mighty contributing agency toward human progress. It offends against the development of the sense of justice among the people which always results from the consciousness of responsibility. It offends against the growth of the ability to govern which comes with the exercise of that ability.

These difficulties of government in matters like that against which this bill is directed, the things which are wrong, the things which must be accomplished, constitute a large part of nature's great gymnasium of difficulties. This bill violates the comprehensive schemes of life by shifting the responsibility of dealing with an important governmental duty which is within the governmental capacity of the States from the States, in which the citizen has a larger share of power and responsibility, to the great Federal Government, where his influence is incomparably less and his sense of responsibility correspondingly less.

In the Federal Government the voice of the individual is lost in the tumult of the millions. The liberty of the individual, his sense of importance and of personal responsibility in government, can be as completely crushed by the weight of numbers as by the hand of a king. This bill does not propose merely the extension of Federal power. It proposes the subjugation of the States to Federal control, the destruction of the States. I do not want the House to commit itself to such a proposition.

Gentlemen, we have already gone far toward concentration of power here. We have gone too far. If my words condemn me, let me stand condemned. This thing must stop. This Government, all representative governments, is pyramidal in form; with us the people as the base, then the States, and last the Federal Government. We can not reverse that pyramid. It can not stand if reversed. Government can not proceed from the top down.

THE PROBLEM OF THE SOUTH.

I confess another concern, and I ask the patience of the House. The hearings before the Judiciary Committee disclosed and the arguments here will show that this bill is directed against the South. I am sorry to have to make that statement, but it would be worse than folly to close our eyes to that which is evident. A condition alleged to obtain in the South is the excuse offered for the proposing of so revolutionary a measure. I do not excuse the lynchings which occur in the South; my opposition to this bill is based upon no desire that they may continue. The race agitation involved in this proceeding is well understood. I have no animosity toward the black man. The contrary is true. But I am not blind to the difficulties which his presence in such large numbers entails and the dangers which are involved in that condition. And no student of conditions which obtain in the South can fail to know that greater and more difficult interracial problems than those we now have are yet to come to challenge the genius, the forbearance, and the ability of adjustment of the people who live there. The responsibility is theirs, and theirs only, made so by the most certain exclusion from the possibility of helpful assistance of all outside coercive influences. The old ties which formerly held family groups of the two races together in affectionate relationship are being severed. No outsider can appreciate the significance of that with reference to the future relationship between the two races.

I warn you now and upon your conscience I place the responsibility that if you do not stop this sort of proceeding and help counteract the influence of the race agitators who are responsible for this bill, at this time when readjustment is in progress, the ties of friendly interest and mutual sympathy which hold in workable, livable relationship the great body of two dissimilar races may be broken, and the wild passions of race conflict which such ties alone can hold back will be turned loose among that people. Legislation can not hold back that passion; you know that. Nor can any constabulary which the Nation can put in the field guard against it. Once the instinct of racial segregation and racial protection which now determines the attitude of the mass of southern people is supplanted by that primitive, unreasoning, nonconsequence-considering thing, hideous in its nondiscriminating barbarity, called race hatred, and the tragedies of East St. Louis, of Chicago, of Tulsa, of Omaha, and of other points outside of the South, which the framers of this bill, by the way, are careful not legislatively to condemn, may be multiplied over and over again. That is the thing we dread. Can you not see the danger of it? I do not make a threat. Neither southern whites nor southern blacks make a threat. That danger is involved in the racial diversity, and nature planted racial antagonism which no human effort or volition can remove and no legislation can control.

All my life I have lived among colored people. I know the kindly, cordial relationship which as a rule obtains between the white people and the black people of the South. I know that the continuance of that relationship is dependent upon the attitude of mutual sympathy and helpful interest which must come from the hearts of those who constitute the different communities. It is that alone which makes possible the living together of these peoples between whom there runs the most definite line of racial cleavage, a thing for which they are not responsible. God drew it, and the instincts of race preservation guard it and can command with irresistible compulsion the life of every white man to defend it. These highly colored, isolated, nontypical incidents gotten together and held up by a lot of professional Negro agitators and white negroettes as indicative of a more or less general condition are no more indicative of the general condition or attitude of the white people of the South than would the details of brutal outrages which I could recite be fair to the great body of the black people of the South.

In support of that statement, I direct your attention to the fact that even when the mob spirit breaks loose there it has thus far, almost without exception, had for its intended victim an individual, not a race, some one who has transgressed, not one who by the incident of race has a black skin. That ought to be conclusive evidence to any fair-minded man of a general interracial harmony which the white and the black people of the South, in working out their own problems, have been able to establish and to preserve. I do not mean to make any invidious comparison, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] told the House in the course of his address in behalf of this bill of a hundred people killed in East St. Louis in a race riot, almost as many as are killed by mobs in the entire South in two years. He said that little children were thrown into the flames by the mob. That occurrence was in the vicinity of his home. He professes knowledge and interest in regard to this matter. This bill bears his name. Yet he does not put into it one single provision to punish those guilty of the acts which he detailed. The city of Tulsa has a majority of northern people who went down there on account of the oil development. Its city government is Republican. I mean no reflection upon the city by that statement. In the riot which recently occurred there, when fire and death swept through the city, when blacks and whites were engaged in interracial warfare, that was a community situation. The relationship between the two races had broken down and the passions of race hatred with nothing left to restrain it was turned loose. This bill carries within it not one single provision calculated to prevent that sort of an occurrence or one single provision to punish those engaged therein. On the contrary, by its provisions and its principles it attacks the only thing which holds in leash the passions of race conflict, the sense of local responsibility of the people who understand the problem.

NO PROTECTION TO THE INNOCENT.

"Kill the innocent—those above suspicion—as much as you please," this bill says to the mob; "but if you lay your hands on the criminal, those who create interracial friction and discord and stir up racial conflict, the Federal Government will send you to the penitentiary." It says to the innocent black man, "If you are hunted down by fire and shot, by the fury of race hatred, there is no help from the hand of the Federal Government, no punishment by it of those who hunt you to the death, no money compensation to your family"; and then it turns to the black brute, the arch enemy of his own race, and says to him, "If you lay lustful hands on the throat of a white woman and the mob kills you, the great Federal Government will send its members to the penitentiary and will compel the county to pay a $10,000 reward to the family for having raised a rapist."

Tulsa had too many people in it, newcomers from the North, who did not know any more about handling the situation than you do. They permitted race agitators and propagandists, those whom you by this bill are encouraging, to do their work in that community and that class of Negroes whom by this bill you would make the special wards of the Federal Government plunged innocent people of both races into a terrible conflict. I am not guessing about this. I quote from the final report of the grand jury of Tulsa County, Okla., June, 1921:

To the honorable Judge Valjean Biddison, of the district court, Tulsa, Tulsa County, Okla.:

We, the grand jurors summoned by you to make investigation of the cause or causes of the recent riot and other violations of the law in Tulsa and Tulsa County, beg leave to submit to you the following report, in addition to the indictments and accusations which are already in your hands:

We find that the recent race riot was a direct result of an effort on the part of a certain group of colored men who appeared at the courthouse on the night of May 31, 1921, for the purpose of protecting one Dick Rowland, then and now in the custody of the sheriff of Tulsa County for an alleged assault on a young white woman. We have not been able to find any evidence, either from white or colored citizens, that any organized attempt was made or planned to take from the sheriff's custody any prisoner, the crowd assembled about the courthouse being merely spectators and curiosity seekers resulting from rumors circulated about the city. There was no mob spirit among the whites, no talk of lynching, and no arms. The assemblage was a quiet assemblage until the arrival of the armed Negroes, which precipitated and was the direct cause of the entire affair.

While we find the presence of the armed Negroes was the direct cause of the riot, we further find that there existed indirect causes, more vital to the public interest than the direct cause. Among these were agitation among the Negroes of social equality * * *. We find that certain propaganda and more or less agitation has been going on among the colored population for a considerable time. This agitation resulted in the accumulation of firearms among the people and the purchase and storage of quantities of ammunition, all of which was accumulative in the minds of the Negroes * * *. We are glad to exonerate the great majority of the colored people, who neither had knowledge of or part in either the agitation or the accumulation and storage of arms and ammunition. * * *

We therefore recommend that "colored town" be policed by white officers; that indiscriminate mingling of white and colored races in dance halls, picture shows, and other places of amusement be positively prohibited, and every law be rigidly enforced, to the end that a proper relationship may always be maintained between the two races.

STIRRING UP RACE HATRED.

That is the sort of thing we dread, white people and black people. That is the thing we are working to prevent, while we endeavor to suppress mob violence even against those charged with the most serious crimes. While we are doing that, and the difficulties are great, you gentlemen of the majority party are "playing politics" with this situation. You are adding to the perils of our whites and blacks by creating the impression in the mind of the ignorant, vicious brute who is enemy to all mankind, and especially to the great body of law-abiding blacks, that he has Federal protection. You are giving encouragement to that group of professional Negro agitators who are sowing broadcast the seed of race hatred. What you are doing, gentlemen, may meet the requirements of the political exigencies of the moment, but it is not worth the price you pay in self-respect and in party humiliation, in governmental confusion, and in interracial difficulties and dangers. It is a tragic thing, the House of Representatives of the United States, the greatest legislative body on earth, yielding to the influences which are behind this bill, making the great Republican Party to yield, the party of Hamilton and of Lincoln, and you, with the examples of great statesmen and of courageous men to inspire you, putting through a bill the constitutional warrant for which its proponents can not establish and the governmental policy of which you can not defend. No party leadership has a right to demand that sacrifice of any man. We people who believe we understand the situation are convinced that you men are fixing to cut the cord that holds in leash the passion of race conflict in the South and bring to the South such tragedies of race warfare as occurred in East St. Louis.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Do I understand it to be the gentleman's position that in order to keep down——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Just for a question.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). The passions of race prejudice it is necessary to give them an occasional outlet of burnings and lynchings?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I do not.

Mr. MONDELL. Then, I do not quite understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Sit down and I will make you understand it. Here is what I mean. Listen to me. Let me talk to you. I mean this: I mean that nobody on this earth can protect the black man who is in danger of mob violence except the people in the community at the very time of the danger. I mean that if the Federal Government interposes its power, assumes responsibility now borne entirely by the people, so that the man on the ground will feel it is not his duty to protect, but that the Federal Government has stepped in and will take care of the situation, then you are likely to turn loose the passions of race conflict in that community.

Suppose this thing happens—and it can happen under this bill—suppose that a black man takes a little white child and drags her off into seclusion where no voice can be heard and no hand can help, and rapes that child, and the father of that child and the brothers of the child come upon him and kill him, and the Federal Government takes them away in the face of public sentiment and places them in the Federal penitentiary, and then has a tax of $10,000 levied against the county for the benefit of the rapist's family, a part of which sum might go to buy that family an automobile to ride by the home of the innocent victim; do you think, as a matter of common sense, with such a policy and with these race agitators, who are putting this bill through, at work you could long prevent a condition in that county like that which developed in East St. Louis, Omaha, Chicago, and Tulsa?

REDUCTION OF LYNCHING UNDER STATE CONTROL.

Millions of black people live there among us. We all live together. We understand one another. We have established a basis on which we can get along pretty well. We have our difficulties, of course. It is an unnatural situation. These isolated cases of mob violence are bad. But if we can keep them isolated we can hope to bring them under control.

According to the statistics offered here there have occurred during the past 36 years an average per year of 112 lynchings. Last year, notwithstanding the enormous increase in population, the number is shown to have been reduced to 62, or three less than the number for the preceding year. Gentlemen who have analyzed the figures tell me that they show 35 per cent are caused by offenses committed with reference to women. The murder of peace officers seem next to offenses against women to arouse the mob spirit.

I have the impression that some of these alleged cases of mob violence included in these figures do not belong in that category. I do not have any personal knowledge with regard to the cases detailed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], nor do I suppose he has with regard to most of them. I am quite certain, however, they have lost nothing, at least, in their narration to him. The gentleman from Missouri, in opening the debate on this bill, among his narrations said:

"A mother and her five children were lynched by a Texas mob in 1918, the mother having been shot as she was attempting to drag the bodies of her four dead sons from their burning home. The crime in this case was not rape. It was alleged conspiracy to avenge the killing of another son by officers who had come to arrest him for evading the draft law. Those are some of the facts."

I had heard something of this transaction at the time of the occurrence, as it took place in my own State, and the narration was so at variance with my impressions as to it that I wired to Hon. W. L. Dean, State senator of Texas, who resides at Huntsville, where the occurrence took place. He replied that there were three draft evaders in this family, arrest was resisted, a battle ensued between the Negroes, who had seven guns and several hundred rounds of ammunition, and a posse headed by the constable of the precinct. I quote the concluding part of his telegram:

> In any section of the country under similar conditions, regardless of race, the same tragedy might have been enacted. It was not considered a case of mob violence, but was a pitched battle between the constable of Dodge precinct and a posse summoned by him and a heavily armed body of Negroes.

I have no personal knowledge of this matter and acquit the gentleman from Missouri of any purpose to misstate the facts. The point I make is that these statements are ex parte statements made by those engaged in making out as bad a case as possible against the white people of the South.

This is not an easy situation to deal with at best, and that sort of thing does not help.

In the district of the gentleman from Massachusetts a few weeks ago, up there at Barnstable, I believe it was, three West Indian Negroes took a white girl from her escort and raped her. A mob was formed, bent on lynching them. It took the governor of the State three days to dispel the mob spirit. It is not improbable that just one thing prevented that from being a lynching, and that is that they did not have a great sea of these people about them.

THE SOUTHERN PROBLEM AS IT IS.

It is pretty easy to philosophize about it, gentlemen, when you are far away. Of course, the number of black men who commit these crimes is very small, but you do not know where the beast is among them. Somewhere in that black mass of people is the man who would outrage your wife or your child, and every man who lives out in the country knows it.

They say that lynching is an American institution. Well, it is, in a degree. Except in a narrow strip of country along the eastern seaboard, the pioneer preceded organized government and homemade law preceded legislature-made law all the way to the Pacific coast. In the western part of my State it was the rugged pioneer who could ride as hard and shoot as straight as the bad man could, who drove the desperado beyond the Rio Grande and established respect for the law of the people and made life safe in that country.

Big cities have not yet developed in the South. In the rural communities the people provide their own police protection. The cry of a woman in distress is the call for every man to grab his gun and go. He does not wait for a policeman. It is his job. In the city there are those who assume a "holier-than-thou" attitude toward this matter, who would turn over in their beds, annoyed at the disturbance of their slumbers, and hope that a policeman would soon arrive and stop the noise. While society has established legislatures and courts, men in my part of the country, it would probably be correct to say, as a rule have not yet yielded to the courts established by legislatures or to laws established by legislatures the protection of their women. There is just one thing they will not litigate. Nowhere, in any tribunal, will they yet litigate the issue of a foul wrong committed against their women. [Applause.] They have not yielded that yet. You see, they had that jurisdiction first. They delegated authority to the courts after the courts got there, but they were there first.

That will change as pioneer influences and ideals give way and police protection is improved. It is changing now. There is that other thing that makes the situation more difficult in the South, and we had just as well be candid about it. I do not know why, but somewhere in the great purpose of God Almighty He has determined to preserve, for a while yet, at least, these lines of racial cleavage that He has drawn among the races of men.

I do not know why, and you do not either, but there is nobody up there in Yankeedom or down in my country that can obliterate them. God drew them in the councils of His infinite wisdom and put the instinct of racial preservation there to protect them. You ask me what we will do to protect them. We will do whatever is necessary, that is all. You do not understand what I am talking about. But some day the North will understand. And some day the Negro will understand that the best friends he ever had on this continent were the southern white people among whom he was raised. Men who do not live in the presence of the danger do not hear the call. [Applause.] Nature does not waste her energies. When men respond to the call of race for its protection, they respond to a law that is higher than the law of self-preservation. It is the call to the preservation of the race. When men answer to that call you can not reason with them. That law knows no reason. You can not appeal to their sense of justice. It knows no sense of justice. It is the blind, unyielding, uncompromising, all-sacrificing purpose of the race to control the situation and protect itself. When that call comes every man who is not a racial degenerate has to answer it. [Applause.] It is the call of the blood. Men do not count the cost under those circumstances. I am not trying to excuse anything. I am stating the facts as they are.

Gentlemen, we will have to work at this thing from every angle. The face of society of his own race must be set against the black criminal, and the white hoodlum who would impose upon the Negro must be suppressed. But, above all, while we are working out these problems we must hold back the brutal passion of race conflict which inspires the mobs in the North. I know what will happen if you and the race agitators with whom you are working destroy, as you are trying to do, that which in the South holds that passion in subjection. I am not trying to cast any reflection on the people of the North. I have no sectional animosity. I like northern people, but there are some things they do not know.

It is not only black men who are lynched for the crime of rape. A few days ago a white man was lynched in Waco, Tex., for the rape of a child. But this is a fact, and we had just as well be candid about it, too: When a white woman is raped by a black man the call to the white man is from his two strongest, most primitive instincts. No doubt when men lived in caves the strongest instinct of the man was to protect his woman. The next strongest instinct is to protect the blood. When the call comes from the woman crying out from the depths of her outraged chastity, there comes to the man a call which reaches back to the days when he was a savage in the cave, and he goes. When that call comes from the woman who has been raped by a man of alien blood, woman, who in every age of the world has been the faithful guardian of the purity of the race—when that call comes it is the call of his woman and the call of his blood, and he goes. It is not an easy situation to deal with. [Applause.] He goes not alone. His neighbors, whose women live under the same danger, go with him. The impulse is to kill, to kill as they would kill a wild beast.

Gentlemen, do not misunderstand me or misquote me. I know we have to deal with this situation. We must yield to the law. But no attempt at Federal coercion can help. Let nobody misunderstand what it means to say in the presence of the victim, "Let the law take its course." In such a circumstance as that there comes down from the mountain peaks of civilization and up from the deepest caverns of man's nature the mightiest furies that ever beat against the battlement of self-restraint. [Applause.]

Certainly, Mr. Chairman, to put upon the statute book a measure of this sort which could serve no other purpose than to give encouragement to the ignorant and vicious, and to stimulate crimes which arouse prejudice against a minority race, which this legislation, if constitutional, could not protect, a measure which would operate against the sense of local responsibility, which alone can protect, would be a crime against those people that can not be excused. What will the criminal read in this bill? Take the hearings on this bill and from one end to the other there is not one word of condemnation. What will they read in this bill as they gather in their dives? Do not misunderstand me. I say that there are relatively only a few such among the great body of black people of my country. Where you are making the mistake and where you continue to make the mistake is in creating the impression that you propose to defend the criminal, you ignore the innocent. I know that we have got to stop it, but I am not losing so much sleep over those who commit the crime as over the ones that have done nothing and whom you are putting in peril.

Let me again read the definition in this bill. Let me show you what they are after. Are they after the East St. Louis race rioters? Let us see. Section 1 reads:

> That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of five or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

What will the ignorant, the vicious criminal read in that bill? Will he read in it a condemnation from the great Federal Government? No. But what will he read? He will read, and it is a fair conclusion, that Uncle Sam says that if I do this thing and anybody in this community gets after me and strings me up, Uncle Sam will send them to the penitentiary and make the folks pay a $10,000 fine.

I am trying to lay this whole situation before you. This bill is only a part of the total which those from whom it comes are doing to bring on a crisis between the races in the South. Their newspapers and their agitators are doing their best to destroy that which makes possible the living together of the two races. I use the word "possible" in its ordinary sense.

I realize that it is a bad situation down there for the black people and for the white people. No black man or white man who lives in the South now is responsible for that condition. Away back yonder your ancestors, the men from New England, many of them, brought their shiploads of slaves from the jungles of Africa and sold them to my people. It was a tragedy, in so far as the white people were concerned. I do not know what you think of it, but it was not a tragedy in so far as the black man was concerned. Sometimes I think God had a hand in that, because slavery was the only door that swung open to give the black man a chance to get away from savagery of the jungle. There is not a black man in the gallery up there who does not owe to the institution of slavery his contact with civilization. It was a curse to the white man, but it so happened that under that institution of slavery these black people had a chance to come to America, and through the institution of slavery they got a species of coercion that enabled them in a few generations to break away from the habits of indolence that had grown upon them by reason of their centuries and centuries of tropical residence, and eventually it enabled their children to be sent to school under conditions of civilization. But during its continuance the institution of slavery was sapping the vitality of southern civilization. I have repeatedly said that while the Civil War was a terrible price to pay, yet it was not too big a price to pay if that alone could have served to relieve the white people from that terrible institution of slavery which was destroying the civilization of the South.

Now, we had the Negro population with us. They were brought there. They did not come of their own accord, and when they were freed the people of the North, not understanding the situation, just as they do not understand this situation now, under the passions engendered by the war, did that thing which had never been done before since the men of our blood first left northern Europe and started out to build up the civilization of the world. It was the first time in all the centuries when one branch of the white family tried to put the heel of another race upon the neck of men of their own blood. I do not hold any prejudice against you. I realize this was the aftermath of a great war, and what happens in such times must be judged in the light of the passions which war always engenders. And these millions of black people were turned loose as they were—with a responsibility they were not fitted to meet. I do not say this to their discredit, everything considered, or in criticism of them—of course they are more inclined to commit crimes than white men are. It would be a most unreasonable thing not to expect it. Only a short time ago their ancestors roamed the jungles of Africa in absolute savagery. They have made great progress. I do not know what the future holds in store for them nor do you. But I do know that for the present, while the plans of destiny are being worked out, speaking especially for my own section of the country, the thing of fundamental importance, to the black man especially, is to preserve the possibility of large groups of black people and large groups of white people living together in the same communities, aided by intracommunity segregation and interracial harmony. That is the one big fundamental thing of present importance. It is the thing against which the agitation and the propaganda of which this bill is only a part is operating. I do not know what we are finally to do about it, gentlemen. You can pass this bill if you want to; you can aid and encourage this agitation if you want to; but I am giving you the judgment of a man who believes he knows. I am going to put the responsibility upon you, where it belongs. My people get along the best they can with the situation. We are all sick and tired of this lynching and these outrages and with the propaganda of misrepresentation.

We are tired of it. We know it is not right. The conscience of the country is revolting against these conditions, and if we could get a little more help from you people, exerted with the black people, to encourage them to run out the criminal element from among them while we work on the criminal element of the white people, instead of sending these Negro agitators down there to preach racial hatred and social equality among my people, you would aid more than you are aiding now. [Applause.]

NOT A MATTER OF SOCIAL EQUALITY BUT RACE DIVERSITY.

I have used the expression "social equality" because it is the one generally used, but it is not a correct expression as applied to the situation. It is not primarily a matter of social equality or inequality which is the thing fundamental. It is not even race equality or inequality which determines the attitude and the relationship between the races, though that may be incidental. It is not a thing arrived at by analysis and the conclusions of judgment. It is not a thing which outside people generally can know about except from observation, and then it is merely intellectual knowledge, if we may use that expression. As between two races, nobody can tell with certainty what will be the racial reaction until the complete test is made by placing in intimate contact with, for instance, the white race a sufficiently large number of a different race either to threaten the position of the white race or sufficiently large that their absorption by amalgamation would alter the fundamental characteristics of that race. Speaking fundamentally, the thing which happens is not the result of anything under the control of individuals. For instance, no white man of normal mind can entertain the thought of that day when his granddaughter will mingle her blood with that of the grandson of a black neighbor. That thought can not get into his mind, even for the purpose of speculative consideration. It is shut out by the control of the race of which he is a member.

There is a race entity, an instinct of racial self-preservation, and the ability of the race in the time of its danger to compel its members to come to its defense. The southern attitude is not one arrived at by any councils held. Comprehensively speaking, we do not have anything to do with it. I do not mean that that attitude may not be exaggerated here and there by the agitation of extremists. But there is a general level of attitude which is not appreciably disturbed by these temporary surface influences. As one moves away from the centers of numbers of the alien race the danger is less and the racial reaction of the dominant race becomes less evident. In many sections of this country, where the numbers are negligible, there is no evidence of race reaction as a result of their presence.

The worst racial disturbances occur in those sections of the country where the numbers have increased faster than racial adjustment has taken place. The Tulsa riot is an illustration. There, says the last paragraph of the grand jury report quoted, whites and blacks—I assume only certain classes of them—attended the same dance halls and picture shows. In a community where a smaller number of blacks lived there would have been less danger of racial friction developing, and if but few no danger from an interracial relationship which that statement would indicate obtained there.

In the South, as I have stated, a fairly workable arrangement, based upon intracommunity racial segregation and interracial harmony, has developed which reduces to the minimum interracial friction and has thus far prevented the development, at least to the danger point, of race hatred. This has occurred despite outside interference, some of it well meant and some of it vicious in purpose. And if you are the true friend of the black man you will leave that situation alone.

If you destroy local responsibility, and the sense of local responsibility which results therefrom; if you and the race agitators who are working with you continue along the line of this bill and the agitation which it bestirs, you may create a condition in the South, despite all that the best element of both races there can do, which will make it necessary in many sections for one or the other of the races to get out.

I realize that I have departed quite far from the matter immediately before the House, but it has seemed to me that my responsibility would not be fully discharged without going this far into that thing of which the matter before the House is a part and to which it sustains an important relationship. With regard to the matter directly under consideration this agitation can have but one possible influence upon the efforts of southern leaders and southern people generally who are trying to stop mob violence.

In the popular mind their efforts inevitably will be confused with the agitation surrounding this bill, and that with which it is related will be confused with the coercive, the "holier-than-thou," the Federal governmental overlordship spirit carried in this bill, which the people resent. You put a bad feeling and a bad spirit where a good feeling and a good spirit is necessary if we are to accomplish. This proposition to drag the private citizen and the public official of the State off to a Federal court and have Federal fines levied against the State smacks too much of the days we would like to forget. That can not help the relationship between the States and their people and the Nation or between the races. I have tried to prevent the probability of it, but I fear now that some of the statements which I have made in explaining conditions and difficulties in the South, the section under attack, the section most endangered by this procedure, may be misunderstood as excusing in certain circumstances the infliction of mob punishment, when, as a matter of fact, I do not excuse. But that is illustrative of the difficulty and the danger involved in this sort of a proposition. From beginning to end, in all of its phases and in all of its influences, this thing is bad. You have no right to play politics with a thing like this.

You have the votes; you have the power, but you do not have the right to pass this bill. That may seem a hard statement, and I would not make it if the unconstitutionality of this bill could be seriously doubted.

In conclusion I quote the words of the great Lincoln, delivered at Cooper Union in 1860:

> No man who has sworn to defend the Constitution can conscientiously vote for what he understands to be an unconstitutional measure, however expedient he may think it.

I appreciate the embarrassing situation in which many of my Republican colleagues are placed. Now, gentlemen, I am grateful for the compliment of your attention and of your interest given during this long discussion. I have not intended to give offense or to be discourteous in word or action. I have done my best to lay the whole situation before you, and now I leave the responsibility with you. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to make one suggestion. The laws which the gentleman has called attention to rest upon direct provision in the Constitution itself. The courts have indicated that there is a distinction between the kind of laws that can be passed under the ordinary provisions of the Constitution and those that depend on the fourteenth amendment, and we have tried to draw this bill so that it will come under the fourteenth amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was being taken, when Mr. WALSH demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. VOLSTEAD and Mr. SUMNERS of Texas.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 100 and noes 139.

So the motion to strike out the enacting clause was lost.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 1, line 4, after the word "law," strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the amendment which I offer to the proposed amendment of the chairman of the committee is to strike out the following language:

> As a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

Leaving the section to read:

> That the phrase "mob or riotous assemblage," when used in this act, shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law.

The necessity for such an amendment must appear self-evident to every lawyer in this House, and I shall endeavor to make myself so clear that no Member, whether he be layman or lawyer, will entertain any doubt as to the merits of the proposed amendment.

Under the laws of every sovereign State in the Union murder is defined to be the unlawful killing of any person, it being with malice aforethought and with deliberation and premeditation. Every killing, however, does not constitute murder for which the individual committing it may be punished. For instance, it may be excusable as where one engaged in the performance of a lawful act and without design accidentally kills another; or it may be justifiable as in the case of being in danger of death or great bodily harm, or honestly believing himself to so be, takes the life of his adversary to save himself; or, again, it may be justifiable as where one sees another in the act of committing a felony, and to prevent its commission takes the life of the felon. In all of the last-mentioned cases the homicide is not unlawful but either excusable or justifiable, and for myself I would ever have it so.

That I may not be misunderstood, and that I may illustrate the legal question involved, I should like to submit a hypothetical case, which, under the law of the land as it is to-day, constitutes no crime for which the person can be punished, but which, if this bill is enacted without this amendment and is held to be constitutional by the courts, will constitute a felony for which the person may be—and I may add must be—imprisoned in the Federal penitentiary for life or for any period not less than five years. Suppose that the red-handed anarchist should at this very moment attempt to throw a bomb into the well of this Chamber, whereby the lives of every Member of this body might be endangered; but he is observed by three members of the police force, who are not in sufficient proximity to the assassin to seize him bodily; they hurriedly counsel as to the best and most effective means to prevent the dastardly crime which he is about to commit, and determine that there is no remedy short of taking his life; they fire upon him, and he is killed as a result of their concerted action and the crime is prevented; yet these officers are murderers and must pay the penalty for protecting us from instant death at the hands of this villain. Again, suppose that three of us were traveling along the highway in an automobile, and in the distance we see the fiendish brute, whether he be black or white, it makes no difference, dragging into the cover of the forest a helpless woman or child to commit upon her body an unspeakable crime; we are too far away to reach her in time to save her life or her honor; we counsel and decide the only means available is to kill the beast; we act, and then we are harnessed up in the United States district court, tried, convicted, and sentenced to a life of servitude behind the grim walls of a Federal prison simply because we saved the life and honor of that girl or woman by the only effectual means at our command. Why, gentlemen, such a law is indefensible even in the sight of God Almighty, and the virile manhood of the North and the South, the East and the West, the rich and the poor, the black and the white, will not obey it, though you place a thousand hells of punishment as a penalty. [Applause.]

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. I have not the time to yield. I tried to get the gentleman to give me 30 minutes, but I could not get it. This law is unconstitutional, and not one of its proponents has in the 14 hours of debate upon the bill offered one line or one syllable of law upon which you can predicate the constitutionality of a single one of its nefarious provisions. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]—and I hope he is here—in one of his perorations yesterday looked to both sides of the aisle and eloquently shouted, "What are you going to do about it?" I would have said to him, had he yielded, that the oath that I took to support the Constitution which gave birth to the flag of my country—the red symbolical of the blood shed for its honor, the white symbolical of the purity of the cause in which it was conceived—the blue symbolical of the never-dying devotion and loyalty to its purposes—prevented me as a loyal American from being a "particeps criminis" to its assassination, as is proposed by the pending bill. [Applause.]

As I have said, no man has as yet offered any justification for the attempt on the part of Congress to enact legislation that invades the province of the courts of the several States, and I now challenge any proponent of this bill to show one line of authority for such action, either from the Constitution itself, or from any decision of the Supreme Court of the United States wherein it has had under consideration the construction of the fourteenth amendment. On the contrary, the Supreme Court in every case involving this question has uniformly held that the fourteenth amendment is directed at State action and not at the acts of individual citizens of the State. Indeed, the reading of the amendment in itself is sufficient to demonstrate conclusively, I think, the accuracy and soundness of the court's findings.

Let us remember that the Constitution of the United States is, so to speak, but the creature of which the several sovereign States and the people of the Union is the creator, and so zealous were they of their rights of sovereignty there was adopted with the Constitution itself an amendment which clarifies the language, removes every ambiguity, and leaves no doubt as to the power conferred upon the United States by the adoption of the Constitution, nor as to the powers left to the States or to the people. Article X of the amendment to the Constitution provides that—

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.

This canon of construction applies to the Constitution and to any amendment that has been or may hereafter be adopted.

Let us, then, in the light of this construction analyze the fourteenth amendment, under which it is claimed that Congress has the power to enact the pending bill. The amendment reads as follows:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The language used in this amendment is manifestly intended to prevent any State from enacting laws which are discriminatory as between citizens, as was well said in the case of Virginia v. Rives (100 U. S., 313):

> These provisions of the fourteenth amendment have reference to State action exclusively, and not to any action of private individuals.

In United States v. Cruikshank (1 Woods, 308) Mr. Justice Bradley said:

> The fourteenth amendment is a guaranty against the acts of the State government itself. It is a guaranty against the exertion of arbitrary and tyrannical power on the part of the government and the legislators of the State, not a guaranty against the commission of individual offenses.

The Supreme Court of the United States in a later case, United States v. Stanley, Ryan et al. (109 U. S., 11), said:

> It is State action of a particular character that is prohibited. Individual invasion of individual rights is not the subject matter of the amendment. It has a deeper and broader scope. It nullifies and makes void all State legislation and State action of every kind which impairs the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

In the light of these rulings by the highest judicial tribunal in the world, and the fact that the oath which I took to support and defend the Constitution, I can not, however much I should like to see the barbarous crime of lynching and mob violence banished from the banners of this republican Government, vote for this bill. I can not stultify myself under my oath, for to do so would make me a traitor to my country and to my flag, unfit to live and, God knows, unfit to die. [Applause.]

Another provision of this bill which I regard as being outrageous and indefensible is section 5, which reads as follows:

> SEC. 5. That any county in which a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall forfeit $10,000, which sum may be recovered by an action therefor in the name of the United States against such county for the use of the family, if any, of the person so put to death; if he had no family, then to his dependent parents, if any; otherwise for the use of the United States.

My own State is bounded by the States of Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Kentucky, Virginia, and North Carolina. Suppose that a mob carries its victim across the Mississippi River from a point in Arkansas, not in daytime, but under the cover of darkness, and at an isolated or secluded place along the river, when and where no citizen is expecting that the frenzied mob is about to enter a Tennessee county adjacent to the river for the purpose of committing murder by mob violence, but they come as the thief in the nighttime, commit the atrocious crime, and return to their native State. Would you, as honest men, penalize the overburdened taxpayer of that innocent community by imposing a forfeiture of $10,000 for something about which they had no knowledge of and no participation in?

You may be willing to do it, but I say to you upon my honor as a man that you have done more to injure and destroy the kindly relationship of the races that now exists than any one step that has been taken since the dawn of civilization. [Applause.]

I speak with a knowledge of conditions, and I lie not when I say to you that the better element of the colored race in my country see this matter in the very same light as I. They have written me and expressed their views freely, and it is for them and their peace, their prosperity, and their progress that I now stand and beg of you to apply reason and justice and mercy in the solution of a situation which is being worked out by the better elements of both races to their entire satisfaction. [Applause.]

Lynching, thank God, is on the decline as shown by the statistics relied upon by the proponents of this bill, but I want to see it forever banished from the land of the free and the home of the brave. I want to see public sentiment so kindled and aroused against this brutal type of murder as that men of whatever creed or color will stand as a unit in just condemnation of the wicked practice. I want to see this end attained not through revolutionary processes but through the orderly processes of law and civilization to the end that every man, whether he be prince or peasant, rich or poor, black or white, can truthfully say that above every cottage, hut, and palace, all alike, the ægis of the Constitution rests, which is the spirit of liberty, the greatest attribute of God. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the gentleman's motion. If this pernicious bill is to be passed by the House at all, then I think it ought to be passed just as the framers prepared it, so as to let the people know just exactly what is in their minds. We have been arguing this bill now since the 19th day of December, off and on, and every colored person who has been in these crowded galleries during the last few days knows that if the framers of this bill had intended to make it a law they would not have numbered it 13. There is not a colored person in the United States who will have any confidence in the law when you pass it when it has the number 13 attached to it. [Laughter.] They know that it means bad luck to them, and I will tell you what the destiny of this bill is going to be. You will pass it in the House, and possibly in the Senate, though I doubt it, but either in the other end of this Capitol or in conference it is going to die a natural death, and that death was intended by the very men who have been speaking in its favor here for several weeks. Mark that prediction. History will show that it is true; that you will never pass it into a law. You have put it out here as a sop to the colored men who have filled the galleries since the argument upon it began. There is one thing about the South that the colored man has learned, and that is that we never fool him. We tote fair with him. We do not camouflage with him. We do not raise a smoke screen in his behalf and then fail to carry out what we promised him. When a Southern State or a southern man promises a colored man something, he fulfills his promise and gives him what he promises. You promise to pass this bill No. 13 for the colored people of the country, and when you thus pass it in the House you know it is not going to become a law, and how are they going to feel toward you when they find out you have been fooling them? You have enough votes here in the House and in the Senate to make it a law, but you will never do it. Do you not know that when it fails to become a law they are going to hold you responsible for camouflaging with them? Do you not know that it is not going to do you any good at the polls on election day this year? I am glad to see such strong men as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] rise in his place and denounce the bill even under the lash of the party whip. Even under the lash of his leader he has the manhood and the courage to stand up here and tell you what he thinks about this bill. He has been a distinguished prosecutor in his own State. He has had much to do with the study of the law of the land, and he knows what almost every lawyer, from the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. HERSEY] down, has said that this bill is unconstitutional. We have been wasting our time here off and on since the 19th day of December with this measure when you know it is not going to become a law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCKRAN: Page 1, line 3, after the word "concert," insert "to subvert the constitutionally established government and laws of any State, and to usurp the highest functions of its judicial and executive departments."

Mr. COCKRAN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to define the crime of lynching with some degree of accuracy. If this bill is intended to deal merely with rioting or violence by mobs, then I think it is clearly unconstitutional. Its enactment would be a declaration that the State has failed to discharge the function which is the essential purpose of its organization. If a State is held by a solemn enactment of Congress incapable of protecting itself against mob violence, then it has no excuse for existence, because the essential function of a State is to preserve order. If it fails in that, there is no reason or justification for permitting it to exist, and imposing on the people the burdens of its support. I favor this bill, and I think its enactment is necessary under the present condition of the country, because it deals with something which is not mere riot nor mere mob violence. The purpose of riot and mob violence is disorder; it is resistance to the law of the State. Lynching is not directed against order. On the contrary, its purpose is to maintain order, but by methods repugnant and hostile to the constitutionally established laws and officers. It is an assumption by unauthorized bands of the sovereign power of the State—of its very highest powers; and that is rebellion, which when successful is revolution. My object in offering this amendment is to make this purpose clear and thus justify the enactment of the measure. If it be adopted, the language describing the offense it seeks to check will read:

The phrase "mob or riotous assemblage" when used in this act shall mean an assemblage composed of three or more persons acting in concert to subvert the laws of any State, and to usurp its highest executive and judicial functions for the purpose of depriving any person of his life without authority of law as a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense.

If the amendment be adopted, I shall ask the committee to substitute for the words "mob or riotous assemblage," wherever they occur, the words "rebellious assemblage."

There is no excuse for this legislation on any other theory than that unauthorized bands in the State have overthrown and displaced the regular authorities and taken the supreme power of the State into their own hands. A mere attempt, for instance, to murder a person by a band of five or six persons to gratify vengeance or cupidity on the part of the murderers, it would be ridiculous to call lynching. Lynching, very likely, would be started against such persons who undertook to kill anybody against the prevailing sentiment of the community. It is the extraordinary character of this offense against law and morals that it constitutes a displacement of organized bands of the regular authority of the State, not to resist the law of the State but to enforce the law, but through agencies other than the lawfully constituted authorities. It is this usurpation which it is intended here to punish and to prevent. And this feature of the offense constitutes the only condition that would justify the enactment of a law of this character. Therefore for the purpose, first, of defining the act of lynching, so that it will be differentiated from mere mob violence or riot, which are its exact opposite, I think my amendment should be adopted. And, moreover, its enactment would bring the whole measure clearly within the purview of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I have no doubt the amendment offered by my friend from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] was presented with the best of intentions, but the title as it now is is more succinct and clear than that which he proposes. The bill as now before the House under the form of an amendment does define lynching. Gentlemen, let us thoroughly understand that this first section in defining the crime to be punished does not aim at the ordinary crime of murder; it does not aim at an ordinary conspiracy for a murder or action by a mob. The last clause, which it seems the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] entirely misapprehended, defines what is to be punished as "a punishment for or to prevent the commission of some actual or supposed public offense." It is aimed at those gatherings of lawless persons who seek to usurp the sacred functions of the court and take the law into their own hands. This provision, as I think, brings it within the terms of the Constitution, which asserts in unequivocal language the right to trial by jury, due process of law, and equal protection of the law.

If I understand what the gentleman from New York has in mind, he considers a lynching a rebellion, or, as expressed in his proposed amendment, an overthrow of constitutionally established Government. I do not think that lynching amounts to that. The gentleman would regard that form of crime as a violation of the guarantee of the fourth section of the fourth article of the Constitution, to the effect that the Federal Government shall guarantee to each State a republican form of government. That was termed by Charles Sumner the "sleeping giant of the Constitution," but I can not adopt the conclusion that the section is broad enough to include authority for the passage of a law against lynching. Lynching is not rebellion. It is, as I said, a usurpation by a mob of the functions of a court. The section in question has to do with the executive organs of a State rather than the judicial. The decisions in regard to a republican form of government, arising from conditions in Rhode Island and other States, were to the effect that the object of that provision was the prevention of despotism or something similar to a monarchical form of government, and it has been said that if the States maintained the form of organization which was in existence when they were admitted to the Union, they were maintaining a republican form of government. It is to be noticed that the section guarantees protection from invasion. The fundamental idea of that section is that each State was a separate entity in the making up of the Union and shall maintain within itself a form of government in consonance with the general framework of the Federal Government and in accordance with the principles of republican institutions. There might, no doubt, be a condition in a State in which courts would break down entirely and other governmental agencies so fail that article 4, section 4, of the Constitution guaranteeing a republican form of government to each State would apply.

Mr. COCKRAN. If the function of the court is displaced by a mob, the mob would be substituted for it as the sovereign.

Mr. BURTON. If it is maintained that the amendment gives greater validity to this section, I can not in fairness go that far.

The CHAIRMAN. The debate on this amendment is exhausted. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am glad to say that the gentleman from Tennessee has struck the keynote in this matter. Men on the Republican side who doubt what he has said have but to read the history of the country from which that gentleman comes. There is no misunderstanding about this business.

We believe in the enforcement of the law, and all the good Negroes of the South believe in that, and the good Negroes respect the white people and aid them in the enforcement of the law. [Applause.] Whenever an infamous outrage is committed upon a white woman in that section of the country the law is enforced, is it not, even if it happens to be enforced by the neighbors of the woman who has been outraged? The colored people of that country realize the manner of that enforcement, and that is the one method by which the horrible crime of rape has been held down where the Negro element is in a large majority. The man who believes that the Negro race is all bad is mistaken. But you must recollect that there is an element of barbarism in the black man, and the people around where he lives recognize that fact.

It matters not what the Federal statute may be, the white people and the good black people are going to continue to enforce the law against the beast that commits rape in the future as they have in the past. You can not conceive of a more horrible condition than for a statute like this, assuming that the United States Constitution would permit such a rape as this upon the people of the United States. If you have the constitutional right to pass this measure, then you have the constitutional right under your jurisdiction to try all the cases for crime of every kind committed in a State under a Federal judge and through Federal agents. It is an outrage upon the Constitution and upon the law-abiding citizens of this Republic.

Nowhere in any country with a similar form of government could you produce such a wreck of the organic law as this measure—the bill H. R. 13—would impose on the Constitution of the United States of America. Yet we are to sit down here and have the police rights and the powers of the judiciary of every State of this Union trampled upon by the Federal courts of this Republic, and no man, I care not what his ability may be, on that side of the House, or on any other side, can answer it.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. COCKRAN] knows that all this talk about rebellion is nonsense. He rose upon this floor to stab the South in the back, and he pretends to be discussing technicalities now, talking about a rebellion. The question is simply whether or not you believe that the people of the United States should have the right to protect the womanhood of the country, to uphold the honor of the Republic, or whether you propose to take all that right away from the supervision of the States and from the States themselves and put it in the Federal courts.

None of the gentlemen on the Republican side have talked about and against the awful crime of rape. All of you have talked about the single crime of lynching. None of you have said anything about the black brute or the white scoundrel who goes and rapes a woman. I think somebody ought to say something in behalf of that poor woman, whether black or white, where a man, black or white, commits such an outrage against the law and against decent society and all respectable principles of decent men, of whatever color he may be. None of you on this floor have condemned that horrible conduct in that beastly creature. It seems from this fallacious extravaganza put forward by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] he wishes the black and white scoundrels to be upheld in the crime they commit and not upheld with respect to the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to strike out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maine offers an amendment. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, let the amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DEMPSEY. No; to strike out the entire section.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HERSEY. I will modify my amendment and move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Is this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] being considered by section 4 as a whole?

The CHAIRMAN. It is being considered as one amendment.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me, if it is only one amendment, we ought to debate it under the five-minute rule. I objected to the gentleman from Texas occupying more than the allotted five minutes, and——

Mr. HERSEY. How about myself?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman propose to strike out the last section or the last word?

Mr. HERSEY. The last word.

Mr. DYER. The motion to strike out the last word, when we have only one amendment, is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion to strike out the last word is in order at this stage.

Mr. HERSEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not interested in any section in this amendment because it is well understood, and must be apparent by the 14 hours' discussion we have had, that only section 4 of this amendment could possibly be held constitutional. All other sections are clearly not under the fourteenth amendment at all. By section 4 it is provided:

SEC. 4. That the district court of the judicial district wherein a person is put to death by a mob or riotous assemblage shall have jurisdiction to try and punish, in accordance with the laws of the State where the homicide is committed, those who participate therein: Provided, That it is first made to appear to such court that the officers of the State charged with the duty of prosecuting such offense under the laws of the State fail, neglect, or refuse to apprehend or punish such participants, or that the jurors obtainable for service in the State court having jurisdiction of the offense are so strongly opposed to such punishment that there is no reasonable probability that those guilty of the offense can be punished in such State court. A failure for more than 30 days after the commission of such an offense to apprehend the persons guilty thereof shall be prima facie evidence of such failure, neglect, or refusal.

That is, there must be evidence before the United States court that the State has failed to give equal protection of the laws to some person in order to give the United States courts jurisdiction, and to obtain that jurisdiction the district court, the United States court, must find, as a matter of fact, that such a failure under the fourteenth amendment has occurred. I want to ask a question and I want it answered before we vote upon this bill. Under the last section, which provides that if any one section is held constitutional the bill is good and valid as far as that section is concerned; that section is the only thing that saves the bill; and if section 4 is held by the court to be constitutional, how can it ever be enforced? It never was intended to be enforced, because it never could be enforced. It is only held out as a subterfuge so that we can say that the House of Representatives and a Republican Congress passed an antilynching bill. [Applause.] How is the United States district court to settle that question of fact? The courts can only settle questions of fact by a jury. How can a jury settle a question of fact unless the case is presented to a jury?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HERSEY. I can not yield in five minutes. The way in which a court determines a question of fact is this: A person is apprehended. He is taken before a United States commissioner for a Federal offense. He is held for the action of the grand jury. The grand jury meets and indicts him, and when he comes to trial on the indictment, the court by a jury can then settle the question of fact which is involved. Until you get to that stage of the proceedings you have no questions of fact before the court. Do you say to me that when a lynching takes place in a State the United States district attorney in that district is going to wait for 30 days to see whether the State takes any action or not? And then, is he going to send his agents down there to find out as a question of fact whether anything has been done or not? Is he the tribunal to try the question of fact? No; under this bill it is the court, not the district attorney, which tries questions of fact. The district attorney is going to perform his duties under the Federal law, and he is not going to initiate any proceedings in this matter. He is not going to search for duties to perform that never have been laid upon him. Nothing will be done, nothing was ever intended to be done under this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pro forma amendment for the purpose of doing a little act of justice and fairness to one of the humble colored citizens of the District of Columbia.

On the 10th day of January, in the discussion of this bill upon this floor, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN], in remarks appearing on page 1011 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, after speaking rather derisively of one of the gentlemen of this House, Dr. FESS, whom he called the imperial highbrow from Ohio, said that the motion to consider the bill in the Committee of the Whole was passed on the 20th, and on the 21st of December the Washington Post stated that the following outrage happened in the Capital City of the Nation, "the capital of a proud people who respect womanhood." Then he quoted the following from the Washington Post:

Thomas Minor, colored, of 2002 Eleventh Street NW., was committed to jail yesterday by Police Judge Hardison and charged with assaulting Mrs. Helen Lowe, of 1107 Eleventh Street NW., Monday.

* * * * * * *

According to the story told by Mrs. Lowe, as she entered the hallway to her apartment she was attacked by the Negro, who was lurking in a dark spot, and was choked and struck several times in the face. The alleged assailant of Mrs. Lowe is said to have been frightened off when a door was opened in another apartment in the building.

When the victim of the attack entered court yesterday morning and saw Minor sitting at the trial table, she turned to her husband and trembling seized his arm and collapsed.

This address was made by the gentleman on the 10th of January. Two days prior to that, on the 8th of January, the Washington Post had this news article:

JURY EXONERATES MINOR—RETURNS VERDICT OF NOT GUILTY IN LOWE ASSAULT CASE.

Thomas Minor, colored, 2002 Eleventh Street NW., who was arrested on a charge of assaulting Mrs. Helen Lowe in her apartment at 1107 Eleventh Street NW., December 19, was exonerated in police court yesterday, a jury returning a verdict of not guilty.

Mrs. Lowe testified that a man answering the general description of Minor attacked her in a corridor of the apartment building, and after severely choking her hurled her down a flight of steps. Attorney Charles S. Williams, representing Minor, introduced evidence to show that at the time the attack was made on Mrs. Lowe, Minor was in another part of the city.

In other words, Minor was discharged by a jury who tried him upon this charge and found him not guilty. Now, Mr. Chairman, if we are to draw conclusions from newspaper articles and charge citizens of this community or any other community with having committed crimes and being arrested for committing crimes, I think we ought to keep up with the current reports of the newspapers. Two days before that speech was made the same paper which reported this man's arrest and his being charged with this dastardly crime had also reported that he had been tried by a jury and had been discharged. Of course, I do not know Mr. Minor. [Laughter.] You who laugh may have suspected that I had some interest in defending a poor colored man who was charged with being the perpetrator of a crime. You may laugh in derision, if you like, that does not affect me a particle. I say now that I do not know Mr. Minor, but I do know some colored men, and some of them are highly respected colored men. I am not appearing here in his particular behalf, but he is a citizen of this Republic; he is a resident of the city of Washington, and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD having carried to the country the news that he was arrested and charged with this heinous offense, I think it is proper that the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD should also show that he was found not guilty by a jury of this community and was discharged. [Applause.]

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 7.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN). Without objection the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONDON: Page 5, beginning with line 10, strike out all of section 7.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, in moving to strike out section 7 I intend to call your attention to a joker contained in this bill. This bill is supposed to be aimed at lynching and at attempted murder by a mob. It is limited to that. Section 7 would confer upon the Federal courts jurisdiction in every case where any kind of a criminal offense is charged to have been committed against a citizen of a foreign country. And this, irrespective of the question whether the State authorities have done or are ready to do their full duty. This section would concentrate all governmental agencies of the United States in one long-distance government, and I submit that every long-distance government is an oppressive government. It would confer upon the United States courts jurisdiction in every case of assault, in every minor offense. Section 7 says:

SEC. 7. That any act committed in any State or Territory of the United States in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, which act constitutes a crime under the laws of such State or Territory, shall constitute a like crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, punishable in like manner as in the courts of said State or Territory.

You do not want to destroy all State rights; you do not want to destroy all State government. After all, the basis of the government of a free people is the self-governing unit. By section 7 you practically oust every court of every State of jurisdiction in the class of cases enumerated in the section and confer criminal jurisdiction upon the United States courts. I submit that the United States courts have not the machinery, have not the men, to handle all criminal cases.

The courts of the United States are too far removed from the people. The Federal judges are not elected by the people but are appointed for life. This section has no business in this bill. It has nothing to do with the object of this legislation. The justification for the bill is that the Federal Government desires to exert a pressure on the State governments to execute the laws against lynching by conferring jurisdiction on the Federal Government only after the State government has neglected to do its duty. Every State has provided penalties for murder and attempted murder. That is all that lynching is. It is the failure of the States to suppress a national evil and to remove a national disgrace that calls for national action and justifies this bill; but by what process of reasoning do you undertake to confer jurisdiction on the Federal courts in other criminal cases, no matter how trifling? Section 7 should go out of the bill; it has no place there. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I am very much surprised at the attitude taken by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON], who has just taken his seat. Section 7 provides "that any act committed in any State or Territory of the United States in violation of the rights of a citizen or subject of a foreign country secured to such citizen or subject by treaty between the United States and such foreign country, which act constitutes a crime under the laws of such State or Territory, shall constitute a like crime against the peace and dignity of the United States, punishable," and so forth.

A few days ago the gentleman from New York in discussing this bill laid down the proposition that he regarded the colored man of the South, whom he seemed to think House bill 13 was designed to protect in some way, as his weaker brother, and that it was his duty to defend that weaker brother by passing House bill 13, transferring police power to the agents of the Federal Government. But now, when it comes to the proposition of the right of a subject of a foreign country, the gentleman from New York complains that it is an invasion of State rights and appeals to us to preserve local self-government. [Laughter and applause.] Is it possible that the gentleman has some cousins who are closer to him than his weaker colored brother of the South? [Laughter.] Ah, Mr. Chairman, this section 7 is the logical development of the fundamental principle of this bill. [Applause.] Gentlemen may come to it now or 5 years or 10 years from now. Inevitably they will come to it, if this act shall pass and be sustained by the Supreme Court. Let gentlemen realize what they are doing in voting for this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LONDON].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of West Virginia: Page 2, line 2, after the word "death," insert "or whose life is put in jeopardy."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I think, grammatically, that the amendment would refer to the officer whose life is put in jeopardy. It would read:

That any State or municipal officer charged with the duty, or who possesses the power or authority as such officer to protect the life of any person that may be put to death, or whose life is put in jeopardy, by any mob or riotous assemblage.

I think, grammatically, that would mean the officer.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so.

Mr. CLOUSE. What would constitute "jeopardy" in the sense of that paragraph or section?

Mr. REED of West Virginia. The officer might not know that the man will be put to death, but he might have reason to suspect by the menacing attitude of the mob that the life of his prisoner was in jeopardy.

Mr. LITTLE. It means liable to be killed.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. It occurs to me that the bill itself has gone to the extreme limit, but the gentleman from West Virginia rises in his place and proposes that the extreme penalty of the law be invoked against officers and the State if the black brute or the white scoundrel happens to imagine that he has been placed in jeopardy by an outraged community. How far will the Republican majority go, if such an amendment as this is to be adopted? That amendment has been offered to this iniquitous and nasty bill, and provides that if a brute who has committed the most horrible crime known to the category of crimes is surrounded by what they term a mob and if his life is apparently in jeopardy, the State, the municipality, the county, and the officer will be subjected to the penalties of the bill. It occurred to me that if they actually took the life of this sort of a creature, the bill is going too far and is an outrage, but the amendment proposed by the gentleman goes even further, and provides if his life be in jeopardy that then all of the penalties of this measure will be invoked against the officer, the county, the State, and the municipality. The gentleman has run amuck in proposing such an amendment as this to such a measure, which any sane man can see is full of flaws and is against the right that the Constitution guarantees a State and is reserved to a State. Yet with a good face the gentleman offers this amendment and asks the House to adopt it. Is it possible that the gentleman would want a scoundrel who had committed rape to be so safeguarded and protected that it would not even permit him to be tried by a court? That is what the language would mean—that he is placed in jeopardy.

It occurs to me the gentleman ought to read the language of this section before he sincerely offers such an amendment as this, which he expects the House to adopt. The courts might construe this measure that if the life of a rapist was placed in jeopardy by a mob all the penalties would still go as if his life were taken and as insured in this bill, so that the criminal's family might receive that great sum of money.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VOLSTEAD and Mr. BANKHEAD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Minnesota rise?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on section 1 and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that debate on the first section of the bill and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I make the motion then, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN The gentleman from Minnesota moves that debate upon section 1 and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 2 of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the bill now pending, from the standpoint of domestic interest and concern, and as far as it affects the construction of the legal right of Congress to enact it, is the most important piece of legislation proposed since the beginning of my service in the House.

With the praiseworthy object which the proponents of the measure professedly seek to effectuate, I am in utmost accord. No man has risen here to defend lynching as an institution, and no man will. It can not be successfully defended. Lynching in its generally accepted meaning is murder—nothing more and nothing less. It is the deliberate, premeditated, willful taking of the life of a human being without legal justification or excuse. It is murder if committed by two men or five, or a hundred men acting in concert. It is murder if perpetrated in Alabama or in Minnesota. A lyncher is committing a crime not now punishable under any existing Federal statute, but which is punishable with extreme severity by the statutes of every State in the Union.

By this bill you are seeking to make murder a Federal crime and give to Federal courts jurisdiction to try individuals who are guilty of murder, acting in concert or conspiracy.

Although the politically indiscreet and sometimes intellectually muddy Member from New York [Mr. FISH] stated that this was a Republican measure, aimed solely at certain Southern States, to punish those States for failure to protect Negroes, all others who have spoken in favor of the bill—the higher ups and best minds on the majority side—have vigorously disclaimed any sectional or racial discriminations. It is to be hoped that these latter protestations of virtuous intent are as sincere as they have been clamorous.

Accepting the Dyer and Fess pronouncements on the bill, both very frankly admitting that their own States have been conspicuous examples of mob depravity, and both rebuking the Fish theory of the motive behind the bill, the race question is not involved at all, the sections are not in contemplation; so that we can deal with this question stripped of all specious or beclouding considerations. In that aspect I desire to suggest one paramount reason why this bill should not pass.

The primary, and what should be the absolutely conclusive, test before we should proceed any further is, Is the bill within the warrant of the constitutional powers granted to Congress by the people and the States?

That is the acid test submitted as a rule of conduct by one of the patron saints of the Republican Party—Abraham Lincoln. His words on it have been literally quoted in the debate. But there is higher authority than the spoken words of any man, living or dead, upon the necessity of that inexorable inquiry. I refer to section 3 of Article VI of the Constitution itself, which reads as follows:

> The Senators and Representatives, before mentioned, and the members of the several State legislatures, and all executive and judicial affairs, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution.

The oath, as prescribed by law, so far as it affects this discussion, is this:

> I, * * * do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion * * *. So help me God.

Gentlemen, can this obligation be treated as a trivial and incidental thing in connection with our service; or, on the contrary, should it not always be our constant and peremptory monitor? I ask all Members to ponder that interrogatory.

If the constitutionality of a measure is seriously and solemnly challenged by its opponents, instantly each Member who is to vote is thereupon morally and in all honor bound to determine to his own intellectual satisfaction that the challenge is not sound. I go further and assert that the strict performance of duty requires affirmative assent to the constitutionality of every measure passed upon the part of every Member voting. This meticulous observance, however, is in practice not always necessary, because most of our legislation is routine and in well-approved legal and constitutional channels.

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land. (Art. VI, par. 2.)

The Constitution itself in Article III, section 1, has set up a tribunal—a supreme tribunal—binding on every citizen and binding on every legislator, to construe all questions as to the validity of congressional enactments. If any such statute is in contravention of that organic instrument, or any amendment thereto, the Supreme Court of the United States is the final arbiter of the controversy, and its fiat is the last word in finality. Shall we not be bound by the decisions of that court? If not, into whose custody shall we submit the interpretation of our acts? Shall we substitute therefor a forum of individual caprice or build our juridical structure upon the infirm foundation of mere contemporaneous opinions?

Resort to that refuge, and there will vanish from over our people that great safeguard of our liberties the boast as well as the fact that "this is a government of laws and not of men." [Applause.]

Abler and more diligent lawyers than I have already presented the decisions of the Supreme Court on legislation absolutely identical in principle and in purpose with this. Those decisions, not one of them but all of them, without one single material exception, are in the record of this debate. They all hold in language that is plain, direct, and unambiguous that the fourteenth amendment, neither in whole nor in part, confers upon Congress authority to pass a law seeking, as this does, for the Federal Government to interfere with or to take concurrent jurisdiction with the States in the administration of its reserved police powers in controlling the acts of individual citizens.

If there were substantial conflict in the leading cases—if there were cases overruled or modified in principle—the posture of our judgments might be swayed thereby; but where the decisions are unanimous and cumulative, where, as is the admitted fact here, that the compelling, overwhelming weight of authority sustains the absence of constitutional warrant for this bill, then, gentlemen, I must confess that blindly to fly into the teeth of the supreme law of the land is not an impressive recognition of the binding force of the oath to which I have referred and comes dangerously near to mobbing the judicial powers of the Government.

I must confess that I was somewhat amazed at some of the argument of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. No man here has higher intellectual attainments. He has the name of a learned jurist. He has behind him a record of long, useful, and distinguished public service; but the illustrious record of Judge BURTON, which I with all his fellows delight to honor, will not be based upon his argument for this bill, but in spite of it. If I had expected any man on this floor to admonish his colleagues to adhere to the ancient landmarks of constitutional interpretation and to argue for the ethical obligation to be controlled by the recorded decisions of our highest court, I should have thought the gentleman from Ohio would be that man. By training and instinct he is entitled to be a preceptor for lesser men. But I can not reconcile that reputation to his argument here, that while the law of the land was admittedly contrary to the bill, it were possible to indulge the hope, and likewise cherish the veiled wish that the firm fabric of judicial interpretations might be dissipated and destroyed, not because they were wrong but because they stood in the way of a more modern and more imperial centralized Government. God help the Republic when the heritage of the reserved rights of its people is stripped from them by such insidious usurpation! [Applause.]

If it is a monstrously evil thing, as it is, to lynch a citizen, I answer that it is equally as felonious and culpable for a lawmaker knowingly to assassinate the Constitution. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 4, line 7, strike out section 5.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered proposes to strike out the section of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota providing for a penalty to be placed on a county wherever a lynching may occur.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. There is an amendment pending other than the amendment of the gentleman, which has not yet been disposed of. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offered an amendment.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I again rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. It is simply for the purpose of asking a question of the chairman of the committee. I would like to know something of the evolution of section 7, the section relative to aliens. Section 7 was contained in the bill as originally presented. It was stricken out by the Judiciary Committee. The amended bill as reported to the House from that committee did not contain it, and the report made no reference to it. We heard nothing more about it until yesterday, when the chairman of the committee included it in his bloc amendment, which we are now considering. Now, I would like to know whether the proposition was finally considered by the Judiciary Committee as a committee before it was proposed yesterday by the chairman of the committee. And, Mr. Chairman, as I will not have the opportunity to discuss the bill further, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I make the same request, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the same request. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But I would like to have my inquiry answered by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This was included in the original bill, and discussed more or less. I discussed it a good deal with others, and as I was making some changes in the original bill I was asked to include it, and I yielded to the judgment of others and put it in the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, that does not answer my question. The committee as a committee excluded the proposition. Now, something has happened since then. Is it a committee happening or an individual happening that explains what has so suddenly occurred?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think I have answered the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Page 4, line 7, strike out sections 5 and 6.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment, which I ask to be reported.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, that is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi can not take the gentleman from Idaho off his feet.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I have offered proposes to strike out sections 5 and 6, or, in other words, the sections that impose the penalty upon the counties wherever a lynching may occur or through which a mob may bear its victim.

There are so many by-products of government that do not have to do with the essential reasons that impelled society to organize itself into what we call political groups that the real cause for the existence of government is commonly clouded over. Having full regard for the multitude of conveniences under government it remains true that the essential end of government is the administration of justice. When a crime is committed by the individual, to that extent government has failed; when a crime is committed by an association of individuals or by a mob, even though it pretends to act in the name of justice, to that extent government has failed.

For the most part the Federal Government has left to the good judgment of the several States the matter of defining crimes of its inhabitants against each other and providing punishment. One type of crime, however, has come to be so prevalent and is at all times so shocking to one's sense of fair play and the protection guaranteed by our Constitution to the rights of our people that there is a widespread movement under way to make such activities a crime under national law.

Very frankly, I am in sympathy with any responsible legislation that may crush out and put an end to so-called lynch law or the violence of the mob.

I speak on this measure as a friend of the general proposition. I condemn most earnestly the lawless acts of a mob. Lynching is one of the outstanding blots upon America's good name. I am in such accord with meeting the question adequately and wiping out this type of lawlessness that I am compelled to do that which is not an easy thing to do; I am compelled to point out wherein I think the pending bill should be amended, even though I do so at the risk of being misunderstood.

Until I had examined the measure it was my general thought that I would give my hearty support to the Dyer antilynching bill. But when the bill was reported and I had had opportunity to read it over and examine its provisions, I was startled to find that among them are some that it seems to me if enacted into law either must fall under our Constitution or else will defeat the very objects for which it is sought to enact the measure. As one who sees what he believes to be a faulty piece of timber being utilized in the construction of a work that requires strength, and who feels it his duty to point out the piece of timber that must give way under stress, so it becomes my duty touching a bill with whose spirit I am in sympathy to point out certain flaws that must defeat the end we are seeking to attain.

PROVISIONS OF BILL.

In brief the antilynching bill provides as follows:

First. It defines a mob or riotous assemblage. (Sec. 1.)

Second. It provides for the punishment of individuals who participate as members of a mob. (Secs. 3 and 4.)

Third. It provides for the punishment of the State or municipal officers who fail or neglect or refuse to do their duty for the protection of prisoners in their charge. (Sec. 3.)

Fourth. It provides that the county in which a person may be put to death by a mob shall forfeit or be fined $10,000. (Sec. 5.)

Fifth. It provides that any county shall be liable to the same fine or to share in its payment through which a mob shall transport its victim. (Sec. 6.)

Sixth. It provides that the $10,000 assessed upon the county shall be paid to the family or dependent parents of the victim of the mob. (Sec. 5.)

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRENCH. In a moment I will yield.

Now, in regard to the first three provisions I can not find myself in disagreement. On the other hand, with the latter three I am not in sympathy, because I believe they are either unconstitutional or against sound governmental policy.

I shall assume that the first three meet the Constitution, as is urged by the committee on the basis of our constitutional guaranties touching protection of the law. The paragraphs dealing with these three items define a mob or riotous assemblage, and provide punishment for those who participate in the same and for the officers who fail to do their duty.

But let us notice the other propositions. Section 4 of the bill, now section 5 of the amendment, provides for a penalty of $10,000 upon the county within which a death occurs at the hands of a mob. Section 6 provides for a similar penalty or a share in the punishment upon any county through which a mob may transport its victim.

It could readily occur that the citizens of a county under either section 5 or section 6 would be unalterably opposed to the action of a mob. In fact, it could occur that the citizens would know nothing whatever about the action of the mob. The mob could bring its victim into the peaceful borders of a county from an outside State, then cause the death of the victim, and by its act impose an obligation measured by a fine of $10,000 upon the county. The crime of lynching might occur at dead of night; the people of the county, law-abiding though they might be, would not have heard of the crime until the following day, and yet the law would impose a penalty of $10,000. The mob might carry its victim through the county without the knowledge of the citizens, and by this act impose the penalty.

Gentlemen, I can not bring myself to believe that such provisions are in harmony with our Constitution.

CONTRARY TO PUBLIC POLICY.

Suppose, however, it could be demonstrated that these provisions are constitutional, I would still oppose them, because in my judgment they are contrary to sound public policy. It is true that precedent can be found in English law for the punishment of a political organization for an act committed within its midst, but it is not in harmony with the spirit of the American Government. It is a false principle in English Government that the English people themselves are growing away from, and it should find no place in the political system of our land.

LEGISLATIVE LYNCH LAW.

Sections 5 and 6, which impose a penalty of $10,000 upon a county where a lynching occurs, or through which a mob may carry its victim, are what I would call legislative lynch law. One of the reasons why I am opposed to lynch law and feel that we must meet it by adequate legislation is because the innocent oftentimes are punished for a crime committed by some one else. That is precisely what you are attempting to do by legislation.

From what I have said it must be apparent that a county will be liable for a fine of $10,000 regardless of the fact that not a citizen of the county participated as a member of the mob or even knew that a crime was being committed. Shall we, especially in a measure that is designed in part to prevent the punishment of the innocent at the hands of a mob, impose a punishment upon the innocent just because a crime has been committed within their political unit?

THE $10,000 FINE UNFAIR TO SMALL COUNTIES.

Again, I am opposed to the levying of the fine of $10,000 upon a county where a lynching may occur because no regard is had for the size of the county, its population, or its wealth.

There are counties in my district, and such counties are in most of our States, where the population is barely sufficient to justify county organization and where the taxable property is so small that a $10,000 additional burden would be like a yoke upon the taxpayers. There are other counties in our country whose population may be numbered by millions and whose wealth aggregates, not millions, but billions of dollars and where a fine of $10,000, aside from the principle involved, would scarcely be recognized as an item in the increase of taxes.

Do gentlemen believe that it is sound public policy that counties regardless of wealth, or population, shall be placed on an equal footing, and that the small county shall bear a penalty no less than that imposed upon the county of great wealth? For my part, I can not agree with the proposition.

AN ASTOUNDING ILLUSTRATION.

Mr. Chairman, to-day as we are considering the passage of this bill, the Kansas City Star is giving publicity to the application of a Kansas antilynching law with fines attached to municipalities touching at least two of the cities of Kansas.

The Kansas law provides for liabilities against municipalities where mob violence occurs, and to-day Kansas City alone is facing 59 suits that represent claims aggregating $949,978. The Star further says that Independence, Kans., has had judgments returned against it for $37,250, and other suits are still pending.

These news items illustrate the possibilities under the pending bill. A peaceful little county in my State or in your State might furnish the theater for a mob to wreak its vengeance upon 10, 20, or 50 inhabitants and penalties would automatically attach in the amount of $10,000 for every life destroyed. It might well be that the victims of the mob were themselves lawless characters who had been preying upon society and who had outworn the patience of orderly, law-abiding citizens.

Let me ask whether or not, in the light of this recent Kansas experience, we desire to extend the principle of county liability for mob violence throughout the United States?

INSURANCE POLICY FOR CRIMINALS.

I am opposed to the proposition of requiring the penalty collected, amounting to $10,000, to be paid over to the dependents or the parents of the victim of the mob.

Government owes to its citizens the duty of protection of life, the protection of the sacredness of the person and of property. This obligation on the part of Government runs just as strong toward protection of the individual or his property against the criminal act of an individual as it does toward the protection of the individual against the criminal acts of the mob. Government attempts to protect both. It failed when the individual committed his crime. It failed again when the mob committed its crime. By what reasoning, then, do we say that the victim of a murderer shall receive no compensation at the hands of the Government while the victim of a mob shall receive compensation which—true enough—is paid to his family by the Government, in the amount of $10,000?

Gentlemen, I recognize that under mob law the innocent man oftentimes is punished for the crime of the guilty; but, on the other hand, probably most times the mob's victim is a guilty man. Let us assume that murder has been committed by some man lacking in moral sense. Let us assume that the victim of the murderer is law-abiding and has a family dependent upon him and that the victim of the mob has a family dependent upon him, but is guilty of the crime for which lynched. Bear in mind that both the persons killed have been denied the protection of the law, that one of the persons killed was wholly innocent and that the other was wholly guilty. Under the terms of the bill you are providing that the Government shall extend no compensation to the victim of the murderer or his family, but you are providing a $10,000 insurance policy in favor of the murderer or any murderer or other criminal who later becomes the victim of a mob. Gentlemen, I am opposed to the proposition.

If, however, gentlemen feel that counties should be penalized in the amount indicated in the bill, and if also the Members feel that the $10,000 should be paid to the dependents of the victim of the mob—surely we should amend the measure so as to provide that through a judicial inquiry it shall be determined whether or not the victim of the mob was himself guilty of a crime or an innocent man. We ought to provide that the money collected from the county shall not be paid to the family of the victim, if it shall be found that he was guilty of the crime for which lynched.

WILL PREVENT ENFORCEMENT OF LAW.

Mr. Chairman, if we may assume that the penalty upon the county shall be regarded as constitutional, then I tell you that not only is it out of harmony with American thought, but coupled with the provision that the amount of the fine shall be paid over to the family of the victim regardless of his guilt, it will prevent the enforcement of the law. Remember you are making the innocent as well as the guilty liable, so far as the fine is concerned. Indeed, you are making the innocent alone liable for the fine whenever the criminal members of the mob are either nontaxpayers or nonresidents of the county. Can you not see that you will thus force into a common purpose in one respect the law-abiding people of a county where the crime was committed and the members of the mob itself?

I recognize that the average American citizen will tell the truth, and especially will tell the truth when placed upon the witness stand, but do we not know that there would be a strong tendency on the part of even the innocent people of a county to omit to volunteer testimony to Federal officers that would be used for the levying of a fine of $10,000 upon their county, whose people have been altogether innocent? To enforce the law we must have the support of right-thinking people. You will not have that support if you insist upon a provision by which a punishment is placed upon innocent people. You will have that support if you will limit the terms of the bill so that punishment will be directed against the members of the mob and officers of government, high or low, who fail to do their duty.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi rose.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, may I have about five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in regard to this amendment that we ought not to object to it upon the theory that it may hurt some of our people. Any law that is effective is open to that objection. This is a remedy that is regarded as appropriate under the English law. It is so recognized in a large number of the States in this country. It is not considered cruel, unjust, or unfair. If the community is opposed to lynch law it can, as a rule, see to it that such law does not operate. There is no doubt about that. Lynch law does not operate in Europe, because the communities there recognize that they ought to obey the law and they see to it that nobody takes another man's life without due process of law. A county is an instrumentality of the State. The county is created for the very purpose of administering the law in its locality.

When a locality selects its officers it ought to be responsible for the action of those officers the same as a private corporation is responsible. It determines the number and the character of those officers, and the general attitude of the people in a community makes lynch law possible or impossible. It has been in force, as I have said, under the English law for centuries, and it is not unusual in this country to impose such liability. I do hope that you will leave it in; to strike it out means, as it seems to me, that you do not want an effective law.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I regret I have not the time.

In many instances the other features of this law will fail, as all laws of that class fail; there is no doubt about that. If you mean to pass an antilynching law that is effective, something that will do some good, this is the one thing you ought to insist upon, and the one thing above all others that you ought to try to make the Supreme Court sustain. It does seem to me that it is clearly within the general logic of the laws that have been sustained under the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution for passing and one for which we have ample warrant in the decided cases. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the debate has been fixed.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FRENCH: Strike out sections 5 and 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that he was in doubt.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 79.

Mr. FRENCH and Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed Mr. FRENCH and Mr. VOLSTEAD.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 62.

Accordingly the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out of the original bill all of the sections after section 1, including the amendment proposed by the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to strike out of the original bill all of the remaining sections, including the amendment suggested by the Committee on the Judiciary. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I offer an amendment, which I ask to have read.

Mr. MANN. An amendment to what?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. It is at the desk. Let the Clerk read it.

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing before the committee except the motion of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. MANN. There is nothing to amend.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill with the amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws and to punish the crime of lynching, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I move the previous question on the bill and amendment to the final passage.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is already ordered by the rule. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER. It is not yet time to do that. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I move to recommit the bill, H. R. 13, to the Judiciary Committee, and on that I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Idaho opposed to the bill?

Mr. FRENCH. I am opposed to it in its present form. If my amendment may prevail I shall support the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to it?

Mr. FRENCH. I am.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman a member of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. FRENCH. No.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. In what form did the gentleman make his motion?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. The motion I make, Mr. Speaker, is that the bill (H. R. 13) be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. FRENCH. I want to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] has moved the previous question. If that is not carried the gentleman from Idaho may have an opportunity.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] to recommit the bill.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 119, nays 228, answered "present" 3, not voting 80, as follows:

DISTILLED SPIRITS IN BONDED WAREHOUSES.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa, from the Committee on Ways and Means, by direction of that committee reported the bill H. R. 10028, a bill for centralizing distilled spirits in bonded warehouses, and for other purposes, which was read a first and second time and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. [Report 614.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we expect to take up for consideration to-morrow the independent offices appropriation bill, which is the unfinished business. If that bill is disposed of to-morrow, I shall ask unanimous consent to recess over Saturday. I move that the House do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 27 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, January 27, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. TREADWAY: Committee on Ways and Means. H. R. 5495. A bill to remit the duty on a carillon of bells to be imported for the Church of Our Lady of Good Voyage, of Gloucester, Mass.; without amendment (Rept. No. 613). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 27, 1922.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 25, 1922.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

CONDITIONS IN WEST VIRGINIA COAL FIELDS.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to file what perhaps I ought not to call a report, because it is the views of the chairman only of the Committee on Education and Labor in the West Virginia coal investigation, authorized by Senate resolution No. 80, agreed to June 21, 1921, directing the Committee on Education and Labor to investigate the recent acts of violence in the coal fields of West Virginia and adjacent territory, and the causes which led to the conditions which now exist in said territory.

I desire to say that it is impossible for the committee to agree on any report; so they decided that each member of the committee may file his own views. No other member of the committee is responsible at all for the views or the report which I here present, but I have seen no other way of handling the matter. I present this report, therefore, as the report of the chairman of the committee and not of the balance of the committee. They will present their views later.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the report will be received.

[Mr. KENYON's "personal views," Report No. 457.]

Mr. PHIPPS subsequently, from the Committee on Education and Labor, which, pursuant to Senate resolution 80, investigated the recent acts of violence in the coal fields of West Virginia and adjacent territory, and the causes which led to the conditions which now exist in said territory, submitted the personal views of Senators WARREN, STERLING, and himself thereon (Rept. No. 457).

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6119) for the coinage of a Grant souvenir gold dollar in commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, late President of the United States.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS.

Mr. WARREN presented a resolution adopted January 14, 1922, at the annual meeting of the South Fork Stockmen's Association, of Ishawooa, Wyo., favoring the retention of the Forest Service under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. PITTMAN presented three petitions of sundry citizens and corporations of Nevada, praying for the enactment of legislation extending the life of all prospecting permits of oil and gas for a period of one year, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

REPORTS OF THE COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 2885) to authorize the acquisition of lands for military purposes in certain cases and making appropriations therefor, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 458) thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9060) to authorize the Secretary of War to lease a certain tract of land to the city of Leavenworth, in the State of Kansas, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 459) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2698) for the relief of Alfred Rebsamen, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. PITTMAN:

A bill (S. 3077) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide capital for agricultural development, to create a standard form of investment based upon farm mortgages, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to create Government depositaries and financial agents for the United States, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm loan act, and providing for loans in irrigation projects by Federal land banks; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

A bill (S. 3078) to provide for the free transmission through the mails of certain publications for the blind; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 3079) permitting the organization of agricultural pools for the purpose of making agricultural loans; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 13) to assure to persons within the jurisdiction of every State the equal protection of the laws, and to punish the crime of lynching, was read twice by title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the role, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	McCumber	Shields
Borah	Gooding	McKellar	Simmons
Brandegee	Hale	McKinley	Spencer
Calder	Harreld	McNary	Sutherland

Mr. DIAL. My colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on business of the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] are detained in a hearing before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is detained on account of illness.

Mr. CAPPER. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING], members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, are detained at a hearing before that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, on yesterday afternoon I announced my intention to ask for recognition this morning to discuss the pending bill, but on leaving my room at the hotel this morning some necessary papers were inadvertently left behind, and without those I can not proceed. I merely wish to make this explanation and yield the floor at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the first committee amendment, which will be stated.

The first amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in section 1, page 1, line 6, after the word "President," to strike out "which appointments when other than Cabinet officers shall be made," and to insert "by and"; so as to make the section read:

That a World War foreign debt commission is hereby created consisting of five members, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall serve as chairman, and four of whom shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 1, line 11, after the word "authorized," to strike out "from time to time"; and on page 2, line 9, after the word "Government," to strike out "and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government"; so as to read:

SEC. 2. That, subject to the approval of the President, the commission created by section 1 is hereby authorized to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the American Relief Administration), arising out of the World War, into bonds or other obligations of such foreign Government in substitution for the bonds or obligations of such Government now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This completes the amendments of the committee. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] desires to occupy the floor. I do not want to have the bill reported to the Senate until after certain amendments have been submitted. I am entirely willing to yield the floor to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I desire to make a few observations upon the question raised by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] that the mode now proposed of dealing with our foreign indebtedness is unconstitutional, and that the only way it can be legally dealt with is through treaty.

I wish to say first that it seems to me in any aspect of the case that it is very largely a moot question and not a practical one so far as the effect upon this particular transaction is concerned. Congress has already undertaken to confer upon the executive, first, the power to make the loan, and, secondly, the power to accept bonds for its repayment, and has laid down in general terms the conditions which shall guide the Executive and the Secretary of the Treasury in so doing.

I submit first that if the bill now pending be unconstitutional, the original act itself was likewise unconstitutional and without the power of Congress. True, the Senator from Montana suggested that that action might be sustained under the war power; but, Mr. President, while much was said during the war as to the war power of Congress, I certainly had not supposed that there was ever any claim upon the part of anybody that there was included in any war power of Congress to add to the powers of the Executive powers that were retained in Congress upon the one side, or that Congress had power to take from the Executive power that he otherwise had.

In other words, there is nothing in any possible construction of a war power of Congress that leaves the three divisions of the Government—executive, judicial, and legislative—in any different position than in time of peace. That, it seems to me, was conclusively settled in the Milligan case, because, however much we may disagree upon other propositions, that involved the question of whether there was any war power to take from the judiciary or from the judicial side of the Government any power that it had in time of peace, and the decision of the court was to the contrary.

That being true, as I think it must be admitted, assuming for the moment that the original act was unconstitutional, the loan was made, the foreign Governments received the money, and they alone must repudiate it, and they can not be heard to repudiate it because of the lack of power in Congress. There will be but one of two things to do. They can pay the principal, or they can pay the interest and the principal according to the contract that was made.

But now as to the main question raised by the Senator from Montana, I have not had the opportunity to go into it to the extent that I would like, but it is clear to me that every contract of the Government need not be negotiated and carried out by treaty. The Senator from Montana correctly states, and cites many authorities to show, that every treaty is a contract; but he has cited to the Senate no authority, and I undertake to say that he can find none, that while every treaty is a contract, on the other hand every contract is not a treaty. I confess that I did not know until I gave some examination to the subject yesterday that that particular question had ever been before the Supreme Court of the United States at all, but I find in a comparatively recent decision, in Two hundred and twenty-fourth United States, this very subject is touched upon and at some length.

In 1897, in the tariff law then enacted, as Senators will remember, there were provisions for differential duties and reciprocal arrangements with other nations. It was provided, and authority was delegated to the President, to make commercial agreements with other nations, upon the making of which the nation with whom the agreement was made should have the benefit of the lower duty. That question came up in the case of Altman & Co. against the United States, where that was the particular question involved. It was urged upon the one side that such agreement or any agreement could only be made by treaty, but that no treaty was made in that case and neither did the Senate by a two-thirds vote on that bill enact it into law. It was enacted by a small majority.

The Government occupied two different positions upon that question. Upon the one hand it was urged that it was not a treaty, because it was not ratified by a two-thirds vote of the Senate, and in a second place it was urged that the agreement made by the President in pursuance of that delegated authority was a valid agreement.

The question of jurisdiction of the Supreme Court was the first matter considered. Under the Judicial Code, appellate jurisdiction was retained in the Supreme Court of questions arising under treaties and the first question to decide was whether this was a treaty giving the Supreme Court jurisdiction.

In no other way could the Supreme Court have had jurisdiction. For the purpose of taking jurisdiction of the case, the Supreme Court held that it was a treaty within the meaning of the Judicial Code; but the court also held, notwithstanding its construction that this kind of an agreement was included within the word "treaty" as used in the Judicial Code, that it was not such an agreement or treaty as required ratification by the Senate. I will read from page 601 of the opinion set forth in Two hundred and twenty-fourth United States. The court says:

While it may be true that this commercial agreement, made under authority of the tariff act of 1897, section 3, was not a treaty possessing the dignity of one requiring ratification by the Senate of the United States, it was an international compact negotiated between the representatives of two sovereign nations and made in the name and on behalf of the contracting countries and dealing with important commercial relations between the two countries and was proclaimed by the President. If not technically a treaty requiring ratification, nevertheless it was a compact authorized by the Congress of the United States, negotiated and proclaimed under the authority of its President. We think such a compact is a treaty under the circuit court of appeals act, and, where its construction is directly involved, as it is here, there is a right of review by direct appeal to this court.

So here was an agreement made under delegated authority to the President, in this case with the Republic of France, whose validity is recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, although it was never ratified by the Senate of the United States, but was made in pursuance of an act of Congress, exactly as is proposed in the pending bill.

That decision, Mr. President, led me to a little further examination, because it was clear that there were in the minds of the Supreme Court two classes of contracts that might be made under the general designation, perhaps, of treaties, one requiring ratification by the Senate under the Constitution and the other not requiring such ratification. I found that in the early days of the Republic this question was considered at some length in the case of Holmes against Jennison et al. and reported in Fourteenth Peters. I refer especially to page 571. That was a case involving the right of the State of Vermont to make an agreement with Canada with regard to the giving up of fugitives from justice. The State of Vermont having agreed to surrender a fugitive from Canada, the question arose as to whether a State had the right, under the Constitution of the United States, to make any such agreement. The court, not upon this question but upon the question of jurisdiction, divided evenly upon it, and therefore no decision was rendered; but all the members of the court agreed upon the proposition that the State of Vermont had no right to make such an agreement with a foreign nation. I want to read from the opinion of Chief Justice Taney, as follows:

> But it may be said that here is no treaty; and, undoubtedly, in the sense in which that word is generally understood, there is no treaty between Vermont and Canada. For when we speak of "a treaty" we mean an instrument written and executed with the formalities customary among nations, and as no clause in the Constitution ought to be interpreted differently from the usual and fair import of the words used, if the decision of this case depended upon the word above mentioned, we should not be prepared to say that there was any express prohibition of the power exercised by the State of Vermont.
> But the question does not rest upon the prohibition to enter into a treaty. In the very next clause of the Constitution the States are forbidden to enter into any "agreement" or "compact" with a foreign nation; and as these words could not have been idly or superfluously used by the framers of the Constitution, they can not be construed to mean the same thing with the word "treaty." They evidently mean something more, and were designed to make the prohibition more comprehensive.

Of course, the Senate will remember that under the Constitution a State is absolutely prohibited from making a treaty of any kind with a foreign nation. Then another clause of the Constitution provides that the States shall make no agreement or compact with any State or foreign nation without the consent of the Congress of the United States.

In this opinion the court continues:

> A few extracts from an eminent writer on the laws of nations, showing the manner in which these different words have been used and the different meanings sometimes attached to them, will, perhaps, contribute to explain the reason for using them all in the Constitution, and will prove that the most comprehensive terms were employed in prohibiting to the States all intercourse with foreign nations.
> Vattel, page 192, section 152, says: "A treaty, in Latin fœdus, is a compact made with a view to the public welfare by the superior power, either for perpetuity or for a considerable time."
> Section 153: "The compacts which have temporary matters for their objects are called agreements, conventions, and pactions. They are accomplished by one single act and not by repeated acts. These compacts are perfected in their execution once for all; treaties receive a successive execution, whose duration equals that of the treaty."
> Section 154: "Public treaties can only be made by the 'supreme power,' by sovereigns who contract in the name of the State. Thus conventions made between sovereigns respecting their own private affairs and those between a sovereign and a private person are not public treaties."

So, Mr. President, we have the Supreme Court of the United States recognizing as valid, in the case from which I have first quoted, an agreement made by the President of the United States under authority of Congress with a foreign nation; an agreement that was never submitted to the Senate for ratification. The Supreme Court clearly indicates that that kind of an agreement, although a treaty under the circuit court of appeals act, was not such an agreement as required ratification by the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, just a word as to where our country would be if the construction which the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] places on this bill were to obtain. We have during the history of this Republic made under authority of Congress, without the ratification of the Senate, without the contracts ever being submitted to the Senate, agreements with other nations upon a variety of subjects that have always been considered and held valid. For instance, we have our postal conventions. The last act, I think, with reference to postal conventions, and the authority to make postal agreements is found in our Revised Statutes and is based upon the act of June, 1872, an act to consolidate and revise the laws relating to the Post Office Department, which is now found in section 398 of the Revised Statutes. I quote from that section, as follows:

> SEC. 398. For the purpose of making better postal arrangements with foreign countries, or to conteract their adverse measures affecting our postal intercourse with them, the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President, may negotiate and conclude postal treaties or conventions, and may reduce or increase the rates of postage on mail matter conveyed between the United States and foreign countries.

I now read from Crandall on "Treaties, their making and enforcement," page 132:

> Section 103 of the act of June 8, 1872, brought forward as section 4028 of the Revised Statutes, likewise authorized the Postmaster General to conclude arrangements with the post departments of foreign governments, with which postal conventions have been concluded, for the exchange by means of postal orders of sums of money not exceeding in amount $100, at such rates of exchange and under such regulations as may be deemed expedient.
> In virtue of these provisions postal and money order conventions have been concluded by the Postmaster General, with the approval of the President, without submission to the Senate. Among these are the general postal union convention signed at Berne, October 9, 1874, and the universal postal union convention signed at Vienna, July 4, 1891, at Washington, June 15, 1897, and at Rome, May 26, 1906.

> Of postal conventions submitted by the President to the Senate for its advice and consent as to the ratification prior to the passage of the act of 1872, note may be made of those signed as follows—

Giving a number of postal treaties.

Does the Senator from Montana claim that all of these agreements which have been made and which have been recognized throughout many, many years are invalid and unconstitutional? Does the Senator claim that Congress can not authorize the President to do any act or conduct any negotiations or make any kind of an agreement with a foreign government unless every such agreement is submitted to the Senate in the form of a treaty?

During the war we sold to Greece two battleships. It is my recollection—and I think I am correct—that that was done by an act of Congress authorizing the President to sell those battleships. If the Senator from Montana is right, that sale was void. When the President undertook to part with those battleships he violated the Constitution of the United States, according to the Senator from Montana.

Again, Mr. President, in what President Wilson did in connection with these very loans when he made the agreement with foreign countries that interest should be deferred for two or three years, as I think the expression is, he violated the Constitution, according to the Senator from Montana, because, according to that Senator, Congress could not delegate to the President any authority to make any kind of a valid arrangement or agreement with respect to these loans.

Mr. President, that is all I have to say upon that branch of the case. I said in the beginning that I thought that it was very largely, if not wholly, a moot question, so far as these loans are concerned. In any event, who will raise the question of the validity of these bonds if they are taken in pursuance of the provisions of this bill? Can any citizen of the United States raise it? Does the Senator think that the foreign Governments giving these obligations will raise the question hereafter that they are not bound by them because of lack of power in the commission which is to be created—and, remember, it must act by and with the approval of the President—to negotiate them? If they did, what would be the result? They have obtained the money, the money of the taxpayers of the United States, and they must either pay according to the terms of the bond, or they must pay the principal. Will the Senator disagree with me as to that? They owe the money; whether there was a shred of authority for lending it to them, they got it; it was our money, and they can not be heard to say at any stage that there was any invalidity in the proceedings under which the money was loaned to them, and therefore they need not repay it.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to remind the Senator of a very conspicuous case where an act was performed through legislation by Congress instead of by treaty, and that was the acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. LENROOT. I was just coming to that. The Senator from Montana, if I understood him correctly, takes the position that if it be admitted that it would be proper under the Constitution for the President to do a certain thing by treaty following negotiations with a foreign Government, that it is the only way in which it can be done. I was about to come to the matter of the annexation of Texas and of Hawaii in that regard. Senators will remember that a treaty was presented to the Senate for the annexation of Texas, and that treaty was rejected by the Senate of the United States. After it was rejected an act of Congress was passed annexing Texas.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Texas was not annexed, although that is the general language used in connection with its acquisition. Texas was admitted to the Union as a State under the express clause of the Constitution giving Congress the power to admit new States, and that power does not confine itself to States made out of Territories belonging to the United States. So the position was taken that, under the power to admit new States, the power rested in Congress to admit Texas.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And to this good day, instead of being marked "annexed" in a certain year, Texas ought to be marked "admitted" in that year.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator's argument only makes my point that much stronger. The Senator is correct in the distinction that he makes, but, under the Constitution, when a State is admitted from territory not under the control or jurisdiction of the United States, I think the Senator will admit that the Constitution contemplates only admission with the consent of that territory.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That very contention was made, and most vigorously, in the debate and the Congress of the United States decided against it. The contention was made that the original power to admit States involved only such States as were carved out of territory which was a part of the United States at the time; but the wider and broader construction that we could admit the States of any territory anywhere was upheld. In fact, if we were fools enough to do it, we could admit Ireland to-morrow as a State of the American Union, under the clause to admit new States, provided we wanted to assume a war while we were doing it.

Mr. LENROOT. And provided Ireland consented to the admission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But the Supreme Court upheld the power to admit Texas under the clause of the Constitution which provided that Congress could admit new States.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly. Texas, not then a part of the United States, agreed and consented to the admission. That is the only point I am making—that there was a meeting of minds between a foreign country and the United States whereby an accord was reached without the medium of a treaty. That is the only point I was making; and exactly the same thing is true in the case of Hawaii. There, again, a treaty for the annexation of Hawaii was presented to the United States and rejected by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, so far as the consent of the population of the territory admitted as a State is concerned, of course, even where territory already belongs to the Union we have uniformly taken the position that the population of the territory involved must request admission. Texas had requested admission.

Mr. LENROOT. That has nothing to do with the proposition I am making. The Senate rejected the Hawaiian treaty, but afterwards the same thing was accomplished by an act of Congress; so, in our own history, upon two very important transactions to the Government of the United States, while the treaty mode was exercised by the President, another means was found by congressional action to accomplish the same thing. I raise this point only for the purpose of meeting the argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], that if power be vested in the President to negotiate a treaty for the accomplishment of a certain object, that object can not be accomplished in any other way. That is the only purpose for which I raise it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will pardon me while I state, for fear that what I have said may be misconstrued, that I have not interrupted him for the purpose of differing with the conclusion which he has reached. I interrupted him merely in the interest of historical accuracy. I have been tired for a long time of seeing on the maps "Texas annexed" a certain year, when it ought to have said "admitted."

I agree with the Senator that the United States Government has other ways besides a treaty ratified by two-thirds of the Senate of entering into compacts and contracts and agreements with foreign powers, and that one of those ways, which has been several times exercised, is through the action of the entire Government by a law, the Senate, the House, and the President making the law. For example, the Senator will recall that several times we have passed acts which were dependent upon some foreign power joining in a similar act, and when the foreign power failed to join in the similar act our original act was held void.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad that the Senator from Mississippi agrees with the point I was trying to make in that regard.

Mr. President, I have only one other word to say, and that is upon the proposition that has been urged that this final authority should not be vested with the Executive, but that as a practical matter it ought to be submitted to Congress for action confirming any settlement that may be reached. Upon that phase of it, I take it that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], who made that contention yesterday, does not urge at all the question of power, but merely the question of what in the interest of the public welfare, in his judgment, ought to be done. I want to say a word upon that phase of the subject.

Mr. President, if this were a blanket power to the executive department of the Government to deal with this indebtedness as it saw fit, to cancel it, or to do otherwise than arrange for its payment eventually, I should be in complete agreement with the Senator from California; but with the restrictions that are laid down in this bill and with the limited powers that are delegated, in the interest of the country I submit that that final power, within those restrictions and limitations, ought to be placed exactly where the bill proposes to place it.

What are the powers? To extend these loans not exceeding 25 years at a rate of interest not less than 4¼ per cent, and to accept the obligations of the countries that borrow the money without substituting the obligations of any other country in payment of them. The only discretion, within limits, is the length of the term of the loan, which is 25 years; the interest can not be less than 4¼ per cent; and the only discretion that is imposed that it seems to me anyone might criticize is the discretion as to deferring the interest for a limited time.

Mr. President, as a practical matter we know that Great Britain is in position to pay the interest just as soon as this funding transaction can be completed, and that she will commence doing so. We know that there are other countries, especially the smaller countries of Europe, that can not pay their interest this year or next year. If we are to have, as proposed by the Senator from Montana, a treaty with each one of these many countries owing us money, or if we are to have legislative sanction by both Houses of Congress confirming the settlement, how long will it be before the people of the United States will receive any benefits from interest payments upon the part of Great Britain? Will the Senator from California undertake to make any prophecy to the Senate and to the people of the United States as to when such a confirmation could be had by the Senate of the United States? Under the rules of this body a half dozen men, as we well know, with other matters pressing before us, can indefinitely postpone action upon any measure coming before the Senate; and, judging from the debates that we have had during the past two years, I can readily see how months of time might be occupied in the Senate upon a treaty or a bill as to whether or not, for instance, the payment of interest by Czechoslovakia should be postponed for five years, or whether or not the payment of interest by France should be postponed for one year or two years. Months of time can be occupied upon that matter when very few Senators in this body, if any of them, will have such knowledge as to the financial condition of these smaller countries, and the considerations that ought to prompt the settlement, as to be able to vote intelligently upon the matter.

Mr. President, the United States is not going to suffer from the authorization with reference to deferring interest payments, because I am not willing to assume that the executive department of the Government will postpone for a single day the payment of any interest upon the part of any of our debtors where they are able to pay it; and I am willing further to assume that where a further extension of time may be granted for the payment of that interest, it is not primarily in the interest of the people of Europe who may obtain the extension, but is primarily in the interest of the people of the United States that it be done, with a view of ultimately receiving the full amount of the money that is owing to us.

Mr. President, that is all that is involved. I see nothing else involved in this controversy, aside from the constitutional question raised by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], other than whether there shall be a discretion reposed in the Executive, because in the last analysis the President will be wholly responsible for any settlement that is reached, responsible to the American people as well as to Congress, because nothing can be done without his approval. In this purely business transaction—and that is all it is, a business transaction—with creditors some of whom are bankrupt to-day, I am perfectly willing to leave to those men, with the approval of the President of the United States, the matter as to whether they shall at once demand the full payment of interest, either annually or semiannually.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, before the Senator from Wisconsin takes his seat, I take it for granted, of course, that the Senator's attention has been especially called to section 3 of this act, which reads:

That this act shall not be construed to authorize the exchange of bonds or other obligations of any foreign Government for those of any other foreign Government.

That would seem to cut off even all negotiations upon the subject as to whether or not our commissioners could accept German bonds, let us say, instead of Belgian or Serbian bonds in settlement of debts. It would seem to say that while we insist that little Serbia and Belgium, both of which were invaded without provocation, should run the risk of all possible loss from the failure of Germany to pay her debts, we, who got as much out of the war in the state of civilization and the preservation of liberty as they did, stand out from under all possibility of any loss from Germany's failure to pay her debts. Does not the Senator think that that is too much of a restriction upon the power of negotiation of this convention?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say that I do not; and I would remind the Senator that if in any given case after this funding proceeding is completed the President, under his powers under the Constitution, sees fit to enter into negotiations with those small countries for the acceptance of bonds of other countries, he has the power to do so without authorization of Congress; but in that case he must either secure authorization by Congress hereafter for that particular purpose or he must do it by treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But, if the Senator will pardon me, of course, the President has power independently of this act to enter into negotiations and to do everything in this act contained, except that if he did it in the ordinary course of negotiation he must report it back to the Senate of the United States for its two-thirds ratification. Here, however, is a positive disqualification even of the power to negotiate concerning an exchange, say, of Serbian for Austro-Hungarian or German bonds, or an exchange of Belgian for German bonds; and it seems to me that either that clause ought to be stricken out of the bill or else these words ought to be inserted at the end of it:

Except with the approbation of Congress.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am frank to say that I would not be in favor of such an amendment, because I do not believe that under existing circumstances there should be the slightest hope held out to any of these countries that the United States will at this time consider, under any circumstances, the acceptance of the obligations of one country for the payment of the obligations of another.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose the obligation of the accepted country was better than the obligation of the country that wanted to pay its debt and could not?

Mr. LENROOT. That might be the case; but I am going to be entirely frank with the Senator and say that I would not want France or Great Britain or Italy, the three great powers, to have any ground of expectation whatever that the United States at any time, now or in the future, will accept German bonds in payment of the debts that those several countries owe us; and I will give my reasons for it in just a moment. I would not want those countries to be relieved of their indebtedness to us and have the United States accept Germany as its debtor——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nor would I.

Mr. LENROOT. Because, in that event, there would be no inducement whatever for some of those countries, at least, ever to permit Germany to reconstruct herself or get upon a sound economic basis. Indeed, the inducement then would be just the contrary. Under present conditions, so long as Germany owes these countries and is committed to reparation in definite amounts, the only way in which these countries can ever get payment is to permit Germany to live and economically prosper.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me further, of course I agree with the Senator that the very first thing to be done is to fix the German reparations so that they shall not be elastic to correspond with the needs of her late enemies; but I take it that the Senator will agree with me that the commissioners appointed by the President, who is at this time of the Senator's own party, will be men of common sense and average business ability, and I have not the slightest fear of their undertaking to accept German bonds for British bonds or French bonds. The Senator seems to me to be shifting the ground of controversy; nor would it encourage either of those countries to demand or request a thing which they know would be unattainable. There are, however, these little countries. Poland owes us money; Serbia owes us money; Czechoslovakia owes us money; Belgium owes us money. Czechoslovakia's credit is magnificent. Nobody of average business ability would undertake to exchange her bonds for German bonds or German credit; but the credit of Poland is at the last stretch. Belgium is in a different position. Serbia is nearly bankrupt.

As to Belgium, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me just this thought, although not perfectly relevant, I think it is an eternal and everlasting shame that either Great Britain or France or Italy or the United States should ever collect one dollar of Belgium's war costs and of the money she was compelled to borrow in order to carry on war when she was invaded in a quarrel which was not hers and by a power not provoked to the invasion and threw herself down in front of the invading hosts of Germany for her sons to be slaughtered, for her daughters to be violated, for her land to be devastated, in a quarrel not her own, but that of the civilized world, of which we were a part.

I admit that I am ashamed as an American that we would want to collect any debt from Belgium. I am ashamed as a member of the English-speaking race that Great Britain would want to do it. I am ashamed as a member of the civilized world that France would want to do it when Belgium's course protected her for the six or seven long weeks necessary for her to make a proper defense. I do not regard this as merely a question between merchants and as between debtors and creditors. It is a question between gentlemen and nations that were lately engaged in a common cause and ought not to forget the common cause when peace has come.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Mississippi I will say that I should oppose any authority to cancel any indebtedness, even though in a given case the merits might be exactly as outlined by the Senator from Mississippi. For the same reason I should oppose any power to accept the obligation of one nation in payment of the obligation of another, not because I do not trust the administration. I do. I do not believe, for instance, that if the power were granted the administration would accept German bonds in payment of English obligations, but I do not want that question to arise in the negotiations. I want it at rest. I want the executive side of the Government to say at the very outset, when any proposition is made, and such proposition will be proposed, if there be power, "That can not be considered; we have no power to do this thing, and therefore it is useless to discuss it." That is why I want the prohibition to be put in.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, on yesterday the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] revised an amendment which he had offered a few days before, and which had been accepted by the Senate. The concluding clause of that amendment now reads:

Or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4½ per cent per annum.

I wish now to offer and have pending an amendment to add, immediately following that language, the words:

Payable semiannually or annually in accordance with the provisions of existing law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few observations in reply to the argument made this morning by the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. Possibly at a later time I shall add something to them after an opportunity is given me to inquire more fully into the views he has presented. I desire to speak of the argument made by him this morning while it is fresh in the minds of the Senators who have been in the Chamber.

The Senator from Wisconsin suggests that it is a matter of no consequence whether the bill is constitutional or not, that it will be impossible for anybody to question it. He inquires who will raise the question, the idea being that because it is impossible to submit the matter to a court for judicial determination we ought to pay no attention to the question as to whether it is a constitutional enactment or not; in other words, that we are to violate our oaths to uphold the Constitution simply because, under the exigencies of the case, it can not be made the subject of judicial determination.

I can not subscribe to that doctrine. There are many things that can be done by officers of the Government, and particularly by the Congress of the United States, the validity of which, under the Constitution, can never be made the subject of judicial investigation. I shall not take the time now to enumerate them, but they are without number. I wish to advert to the cases which the Senator feels are persuasive in connection with the question of the right of Congress to delegate to the Secretary of the Treasury and other members of the commission the authority to enter into these agreements with foreign powers concerning this enormous debt of $11,000,000,000.

The Senator finds a justification for his view that the Congress has that power in the case of Altman against the United States. He argues, as I understand him, that there are certain agreements with foreign powers which may properly be denominated as treaties. Those require the ratification of the Senate. There are other agreements with foreign powers which do not require the ratification of the Senate. The Senator has not argued that the matter before us falls within that class. He leaves that for inference. But let us consider for a moment just exactly what the case of Altman against United States is.

That case arose under the tariff act of 1897. That act first came before the Supreme Court for consideration in the case of Field against Clark. It provided that if the President of the United States should enter into an agreement with a foreign power to the effect that that foreign power should admit our products into its territories upon terms satisfactory to the President of the United States, he was authorized to issue a proclamation under which the goods of that foreign country should be introduced into our country at a lower rate than that prescribed by the act.

The validity of that act was attacked. Observe, the question was whether the lower rate provided by the statute should go into operation upon a certain contingency, namely, the negotiation of an agreement between the President of the United States and a foreign power. It was not at all a question of the validity of that agreement, whether it was a valid one or whether it was not a valid one. That was a fact the occurrence of which set into operation the lower rate prescribed by the statute. Let us not grow confused about that matter. The Supreme Court, in considering the case of Field against Clark, after referring to many authorities, said:

> As the suspension was absolutely required when the President ascertained the existence of a particular fact, it can not be said that in ascertaining that fact and in issuing his proclamation, in obedience to the legislative will, he exercised the function of making laws. Legislative power was exercised when Congress declared that the suspension should take effect upon a named contingency. What the President was required to do was simply in execution of the act of Congress. It was not the making of law. He was the mere agent of the lawmaking department to ascertain and declare the event upon which its expressed will was to take effect. It was a part of the law itself as it left the hands of Congress that the provisions, full and complete in themselves, permitting the free introduction of sugars, molasses, coffee, tea, and hides, from particular countries, should be suspended, in a given contingency, and that in case of such suspensions certain duties should be imposed. (Field v. Clark, 143 U. S. Repts., 693.)

In other words, whether it was valid or whether it was invalid, whenever the President of the United States should enter into this agreement with a foreign power, then the lower rate of duty was to go into effect. That was all there was to it. Obviously, that is not a treaty within the meaning of the Constitution. The statute might just as well have provided that whenever a foreign country reduced its rates of duty upon our goods 20 per cent, then the lower rate should go into effect; that whenever they do that—that is to say, when that contingency arises—the lower rate was to go into effect. That was not the arrangement. It was arranged that whenever the President of the United States should enter into an agreement with them that they were to do certain things, then the lower rate was to go into effect.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Did not the court in the case of Altman against The United States recognize and in reality affirm the validity of that agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I do not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. LENROOT. Did not the court in that case recognize and affirm the validity of that agreement, not only that it was made, but that it was a valid agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It was not a question of the validity of the agreement at all. The word "treaty" was used in the act. The question arose as to whether the word "treaty" as used in the act embraced such an agreement as this referred to, and the court held that it did. They did not hold that that was a treaty within the meaning of the word "treaty" as used in the Constitution at all.

Mr. LENROOT. They held that it was not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; they did not hold it was not, so far as that is concerned. That was not the question. They held that it was a treaty within the meaning of the word as used in the act, not as used in the Constitution, and accordingly they held that it was a question arising under the law of the United States and gave the courts jurisdiction. That was all that was held in the Altman case.

But, of course, in that connection reference was made to the other provision of the Constitution, and the fact that no State shall enter into any treaty contract or agreement with another power, and that clearly implies as a matter of fact that some kind of contracts may be made between foreign powers that are denominated treaties. That is the conclusion which the Senator from Wisconsin draws from the case of Altman against The United States, but he does not need Altman against The United States for that. He has the Constitution itself, which provides that no State shall enter into any contract, agreement, or compact with a foreign power.

The Senator referred to agreements which have been entered into with foreign powers by the President of the United States upon the authorization of Congress. He referred to the postal convention. I shall speak of that and then pass to his reference to Hawaii. But, Mr. President, the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, when he was Solicitor General, gave us a perfectly sound basis for all of these postal conventions in an opinion which he rendered to the President of the United States. It is found in Nineteenth Opinions of the Attorney General, at page 513. After stating the proposition and citing cases decided by the Supreme Court in the early history of that tribunal the learned Chief Justice continues:

> It seems to me apparent, then, from the cases cited, that where long usage, dating back to a period contemporary with the adoption of the Constitution, sanctions an interpretation of that instrument different from that which would be reached by the ordinary rules of construction were the question a new one, the usage will be followed. It becomes important, therefore, in determining the question here to be answered to trace from the beginning of the Government, if possible, the course of legislation out of which section 398 was developed and the practice of the Post Office Department with reference to the subject matter of that section.

He reviews legislation upon that subject at considerable length and then concludes:

> It is fair to presume from the material at hand, therefore, that from the legislation of 1792 above given upon this subject down to the present time the Postmaster General, by the authority conferred in the acts of Congress to which reference has been made, has exercised the treaty-making power of the Government in so far as it was necessary to the improvement of the foreign mail service, and that, with the single exception of the postal treaty of 1848 between England and this country, to which reference has been made, the concurrence of the Senate has not been deemed necessary to the validity of such treaties. The powers of the Postmaster General in this regard under the present statutes are larger and at the same time better defined than they were in the act of 1792, but the general character of the power—that is, of binding the Government by a contract with a foreign nation with reference to interpostal conveniences—has not been changed.
> From the foundation of the Government to the present day, then, the Constitution has been interpreted to mean that the power vested in the President to make treaties, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senate, does not exclude the right of Congress to vest in the Postmaster General power to conclude conventions with foreign Governments for the cheaper, safer, and more convenient carriage of foreign mails. The existence of such a power in Congress may, perhaps, be worked out from the authority given to that body in the seventh clause of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution to establish post offices and post roads. This has always been construed to mean power to organize and carry on the Post Office Department. Foreign mail is so closely connected with a proper system of inland mail as that the power to organize and carry on a general post-office system would seem to imply a power to organize in connection therewith a system of foreign mails, and, in the maintenance of such a system, a power to conclude contracts with the post-office departments of other countries. The delegation of these implied powers by Congress to the Postmaster General, sanctioned by usage since the adoption of the Constitution, on the principles laid down in the case of Ware v. United States, supra, has acquired constitutional validity.

Now, Mr. President, that is the rule laid down, that where a construction has been given to the Constitution from the time it was adopted down to the present time that has some justification in the language of the Constitution it will not be departed from. The Chief Justice said that it probably can be worked out from the power given to Congress to establish post offices and post roads, which might be elaborated to signify that Congress has power to establish post offices and post roads not only within the United States but also to make arrangements with foreign Governments for the transference of our mail to those countries and their mail to us. That is to say, the Chief Justice said that that is implied in the language used just as much as if it had been written there, or at least he says that is a fair and reasonable contention. That is the construction that was given to the Constitution from the time of its adoption down to the present time.

Now, I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin if he can call the attention of the Senate to any practice under which the President of the United States or anybody else is authorized by Congress, since the adoption of the Constitution or at any time, to negotiate with foreign Governments to adjust and settle claims against those foreign Governments by the Government of the United States except in the case of private claims where the parties themselves consent to the arrangement.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether he regards the sale by President Wilson of two battleships to Greece as constitutional.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am going to speak of that in a moment. That is not the question I was asking. Not being answered, I suppose the Senator has no answer to make.

Mr. LENROOT. He did such a thing.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is not an answer to my question. I am asking the Senator if he has any information to give us concerning legislation which authorizes the compromise and settlement of claims by the Government against a foreign Government, dating from the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say that I do not know, perhaps the Senator does, of an instance where our Government ever loaned money to another Government before this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not; but I do have in mind that claims of our Government against foreign Governments have arisen frequently.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly, and if the Senator from Montana takes the position—and I assume from his argument yesterday that he does—that the original act being under the war power was a valid exercise of constitutional power, the fact of the indebtedness has been legally and lawfully established. It has been legally and lawfully determined under what conditions those loans can be repaid. The amount is determined. It is a question whether there can be some slight modification of the terms of an agreement, which the Senator from Montana said yesterday was lawfully made, without a new treaty.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That answer to my very direct question may be satisfactory to the Senator from Wisconsin, but I submit that it is no answer. I am asking the Senator if he can call our attention to any legislation of Congress, any action of the departments, reaching back to the time of the adoption of the Constitution, or in the contemporary history, authorizing anything of the nature suggested by this bill?

Mr. LENROOT. I thought I had made that plain. I know of no case—perhaps the Senator does—where there was ever a claim against a foreign Government that had been liquidated and acknowledged. We have always had treaties in such cases. The purpose has been, first, to determine the question of liability, and second, the amount.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator could not have attended at all to the instance to which I referred and to which I shall again refer of the Sicilian claims, which were to be liquidated by an arbitral tribunal, and the Secretary of the Treasury was then authorized, after the claims had been so liquidated, to compromise and settle them upon some other basis.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; and the President based that action upon the ground that vested rights were acquired by private citizens, did he not; that it involved the vested rights of private citizens?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not at all. The Senator is quite in error as to that. The President of the United States said that, inasmuch as the claims were those of private citizens, if they agreed that he should settle the matter, as a matter of course, he had the power to settle it, and if they did not agree he did not have such power, and Congress could not either grant it to him or take it away.

I read the language of the President, which is found at page 146 of the compilation entitled "Messages and Papers of the Presidents, volume 37, House Miscellaneous Documents":

> I respectfully return to the Senate, where it originated, the "act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to compromise the claims allowed by the commissioners under the treaty with the King of The Two Sicilies, concluded October 14, 1832," without my signature.
> The act is, in my judgment, inconsistent with the division of power in the Constitution of the United States, as it is obviously founded on the assumption that an act of Congress can give power to the Executive or to the head of one of the departments to negotiate with a foreign Government.

That seems quite direct—

> As it is obviously founded on the assumption that an act of Congress can give power to the Executive or to the head of one of the departments to negotiate with a foreign Government. The debt due by the King of The Two Sicilies will, after the commissioners have made their decision, become the private vested property of the citizens of the United States to whom it may be awarded. Neither the Executive nor the legislature can properly interfere with it without their consent. With their consent the Executive has competent authority to negotiate about it for them with a foreign Government—an authority Congress can not constitutionally abridge or increase.

That seems quite plain. President Jackson took the view that Congress could not possibly delegate to the President or to the head of a department the power and authority to negotiate with a foreign Government concerning the claims which had been liquidated, or which were to be liquidated.

Mr. LENROOT. The President already had the power, and there was nothing to be added to it by the act. Is not that true?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The President had the power with the consent of the claimants.

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. The President therefore vetoed the bill because Congress could not possibly give him that power, even if he did not have it.

Now, let us come to the case of Hawaii. The agreement with Hawaii is another agreement which was entered into without Executive action; an agreement which was congressional in its character. How was it an agreement that was entered into with anybody? Here are the facts concerning the annexation of Hawaii as given in Crandall on Treaties at page 138:

> A treaty was signed at Washington June 16, 1897, with the Republic of Hawaii for the annexation of that Republic to the United States. The treaty was ratified by the Hawaiian Legislature, but the cession was accepted and confirmed on the part of the United States by a joint resolution approved July 7, 1898. Although, as a matter of fact, the resolution was agreed to in the Senate July 6, by a two-thirds vote, the annexation was effected by an act by the legislative—not the treaty making—power. In 1845 a foreign State was by an act of Congress incorporated and admitted as a State into the Union; in 1898 a foreign State was by act of Congress brought within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States. In each case, however—> the other contracting party by the very agreement lost its identity as a separate nation with which international relations could thereafter exist, and the agreement by which the incorporation was effected ceased thereupon to be an international compact.

"In each case, however"—

That is the explanation given of that transaction.

Then the Senator from Wisconsin takes great comfort out of the sale of two ships to Greece. Another kind of agreement, frequently adverted to in discussions of this subject, depends upon the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in time of war. The President is authorized to make all kinds of agreements with foreign countries under those circumstances, because a foreign war necessarily contemplates that the President is going to come into contact with foreign powers; and so all the authorities agree that the President of the United States in time of war, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, may make sales of Government property. The Senator has referred to the sale of a large amount of Government property to France and to other countries, all of which was done by the President of the United State as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. There were many agreements with foreign nations which may satisfy those who want to vote for the pending bill, at least may afford them some excuse for their action, but as a justification from a legal standpoint they do not commend themselves to anyone who studies them with any degree of care.

Agreements of this kind are referred to by Willoughby in the first volume of his work on the Constitution in section 198 et sequitur. For instance, the President is entitled to enter into modi vivendi, which are merely temporary arrangements looking to a complete and satisfactory treaty thereafter to be entered into.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I read the Senator's speech in reference to this matter with great interest, and I am now listening to him with great interest, but do I understand him to say that a state of war automatically suspends the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I did not say that at all.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I rather gathered that when I read the Senator's speech, and if it would not divert him at all, I should be glad if he would define his position.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. President, when this matter was exceedingly rife, at the urgent solicitation of my esteemed friend, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I addressed the State bar association of his State upon that subject. I think the address was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I discussed in that address the legislation which was then engaging the attention of Congress or which had been engaging the attention of Congress, much of which seemed to be quite beyond what was generally theretofore conceived to be the legitimate scope of the powers of Congress, but which I thought were justified under the power of Congress to declare war and to make provision for the carrying on successfully of war. I urged that the ordinary powers of the Congress of the United States as they existed from time to time are expanded and enter into an almost unlimited field when it comes to the prosecution of war. I did not undertake to say that all of the legislation then enacted in the hurry to which the Congress was at the time subjected would stand the test of the Constiution, but I called attention to many decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States arising out of legislation, chiefly enacted during the Civil War, which was justified under the war power of Congress, but which under ordinary circumstances we would not consider at all constitutional.

One case particularly to which I referred was a statute enacted by Congress which set up a statute of limitation in all of the States having seceded from the Union as in favor of a citizen resident in one of the States adhering to the Union. Despite the local statutes of limitation, residents of the Union States went into the Southern States and maintained their actions there under the protection of the Federal statute.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to finish the statement. Under all ordinary circumstances the enactment of statutes of limitations would be considered as a purely local matter, but it was justified by the Supreme Court of the United States that as within the power of Congress in connection with the prosecution of war.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I have not had the time to look the matter up, but I was under the impression that the Supreme Court had decided that a state of war did not suspend the Constitution.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Supreme Court has so decided, and it was not argued that the statute was valid because the Constitution was suspended during a state of war; but it was justified under the Constitution, it being held that the Constitution gave Congress power to declare war; that that meant to enact any legislation which, in the judgment of Congress, contributed to bring about the final success of the war. That being a reasonable conclusion upon the part of Congress, the court argued that the statute referred to was a reasonable incident to war and not against the Constitution but under the Constitution, which gave Congress the power to declare war.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's view that in time of war Congress can delegate the power to the President to make treaties without those treaties being consented to by the Senate?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I do not think so. I do not think the power of Congress to declare war reaches so far as to justify a statute delegating to the President the power to make treaties. I have not so contended; but I was calling attention to some of the agreements that may be made by the President of the United States which need not be ratified by the Senate, one class of which is such agreements as he makes as Commander in Chief of the Army. I will read the headings from Willoughby:

International agreements entered into by the President under his military powers.

In the exercise of his powers as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy the President of the United States, from both necessity and convenience, is often called upon to enter into arrangements which are of an international character. These conventions do not require the approval of the Senate.

They do not require the approval of the Senate, because the Constitution provides that the President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and with that grant of power goes all the necessary incidents to make it effective in its operation, and of course that would include not only the buying of necessary articles from a foreign Government but the sale of unnecessary articles to a foreign Government. I undertake to say, Mr. President, it would go so far as to justify the statute which we enacted giving the President of the United States the power to loan money to the foreign Governments. In other words, it was an exercise of his power which can be justified, I think, upon that ground, although it may be justified, as I said yesterday, upon the ground that the money got into the hands of the foreign Governments, and whether it got there pursuant to the Constitution or contrary to the Constitution they owe us the obligation to pay the money back.

The next heading is:

International agreements entered into, or action taken by the President, by virtue of authority granted him by treaties previously ratified.

That is to say, if we make an agreement with a foreign power, general in its character, and the President is directed to carry out that treaty he may make such incidental agreements with foreign powers as may be necessary to complete the execution of that treaty.

Next we come—and this concludes the list—to—

International agreements entered into, or action taken by the President, by virtue of authority granted him by congressional statute.

Under that heading fall the postal conventions to which I have referred, and which are justified by a Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the ground that the Congress was given power to establish post offices and post roads, which includes, in all reasonable probability, the power to enter into postal conventions with foreign Governments. It has been so held from the time the Constitution was adopted down even to the present day.

Then there are the tariff arrangements, to which the Senator has referred, and which were under consideration in the case of Altman & Co. against the United States, which, as I have said, involved nothing more than this: The law provided that when a certain contingency should exist, namely, that the President of the United States had made an agreement with some foreign power—not until it was ratified by the Senate but when the agreement was made—a lower rate should go into effect and that was all there was to it. The headings cited, Mr. President, include the kind of agreements it is said the President of the United States may make with foreign powers without the approval and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I will yield to him in a moment. Not only are there none of them which give even color to the legislation that is before us, but the only precedent that we have, so far as is thus far disclosed, is the precedent occuring at the time of Andrew Jackson, and the ruling of the executive department, instead of confirming it, was against the exercise of the power. I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understood the Senator correctly, but I will ask him this question: Did the Senator say that he thought the President would have had power to make the existing loans to foreign Governments without any authority of Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course he could not make the loans without the authority of Congress, because the Constitution provides that no money shall be paid out of the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law, so the President could not get the money out of the Treasury to make them; but Congress having made the appropriation for that purpose, I believe that it was within the constitutional powers of the President of the United States, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, to loan that money to foreign Governments. I believe that it was just as much an act done by him as Commander in Chief, it was perhaps more effective, than if he had put an army of 10,000 men in the field, or l ad sent them upon a particular mission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I agree that the possession of that amount of money might have been more effective in winning the war than the furnishing of 10,000 men in the field. Nevertheless, do I understand the Senator correctly? Does the Senator claim that the President, without having the power actually to get the money out of our Treasury and into the possession of a foreign Government, would have had power to make an agreement that the money should be loaned to those foreign Governments, which agreement would be binding upon this country, without the consent of Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will recall that the Congress made an appropriation of $100,000,000—that is my recollection; possibly it was a billion—and put it at the disposal of the President without any restriction whatever.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Nobody denies that the Congress had the power to do that, so far as I know.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; but, if the Senator will pardon me, I believe that that general appropriation having been made to the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army, he had the right to use that money in such a way as in his best judgment would contribute to the winning of the war; and if, in his judgment, it was wise to loan some of that money to a foreign power to carry on the war, I think he had that power as Commander in Chief.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not doubt that. Where Congress places a sum of money at the disposal of the President to be used in his discretion, I do not doubt that he may use it in his discretion. What I ask the Senator, however, is this: Do I understand him to claim that even during the war the President, as Commander in Chief of the Army, would have had authority by his word alone to bind this country to pay foreign Governments any amount of money without the consent of Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should scarcely think so.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It did not seem to me that he would have; and I understood that the Senator used some language which I thought intimated that he thought the President might have authority to do that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; I think not. I think that notwithstanding the large powers of the President, if he wants to expend money for any purpose he must come to Congress to get the authority to spend that money, even in time of war.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Then let me ask the Senator to explain his statement a little further, if he can make me understand it—and that may be a hopeless task. I understood the Senator to say that as Commander in Chief the President had authority to buy all the property that was necessary to carry on the war, or to sell any foreign Government the property of this Government for the purpose of carrying on the war. Did the Senator mean that he would have the authority to do either of those things without the authority of Congress?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that as Commander in Chief of the Army he would have the power to sell material in the field without specific authority from Congress. I think, also, that as Commander in Chief he would have the power to buy munitions of war without specific authority from Congress if Congress had made some kind of an appropriation upon which he could lay his hands.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, he would have authority if he had authority; but in the absence of an act of Congress giving him authority to run up a debt against this country, the Senator would not claim that he had authority to run the country into debt, would be?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think not. I think that is implied in the provision of the Constitution that no money should be paid out of the Treasury except in pursuance of an appropriation made by law. I think that means that no officer of the Government has the right to contract any indebtedness, so far as the United States is concerned, contemplating the payment of money out of the Treasury.

Of course, that is a hurried opinion that I give. It may not be worth anything, and probably has not any value; but that is my opinion of the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wanted, as I say, to understand the Senator's position, if possible. It never occurred to me, because the President was Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and was in that capacity the active head of military operations and the Chief Executive of the country at the same time, that he had the right or the power under the Constitution to incur any debt in behalf of the country and to bind the country for a dollar without the authority of Congress, because if he could do that, he would have the power to decide what the amount of the national debt of the United States of America should be. If he could contract a debt of $1,000, he could contract a debt of $10,000,000,000 without consulting Congress about it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I am disposed to agree with the Senator as to that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator remember any moment during any of our wars when there have not been obligations of the Government incurred far in excess of any previous appropriations of Congress, either the Civil War or the Mexican War or this war? It is, of course, true that in order to get the money out of the Treasury to pay the debts, Congress must make an appropriation; but if Mr. Lincoln had been confined to appropriations already made during the Civil War, the South would have been an independent country to-day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We all know, Mr. President, that even in time of peace, when exigencies arise, the heads of the departments as well as the President of the United States freely utilize moneys at their command in one way or another, trusting to Congress to approve and to ratify their acts; and just exactly in the same way it often transpires that the agent of a private corporation will exceed his powers, and the corporation could repudiate the obligation if it desired to do so, but he is perfectly confident that the corporation will not repudiate the obligation; and the corporation eventually comes through, from a sense of honor and a sense of its interest, and makes the necessary ratification and appropriates the money. That, however, is separate and apart from the question as to whether the act is a legal one.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. After the appropriation has been made, and these Governments get the money, if the President should be of the opinion that the cancellation of these debts would assist in our prosecution of the war, does the Senator think the President, as Commander in Chief, would have power to cancel these foreign debts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The question is not particularly relevant here.

Mr. LENROOT. As to the scope which the Senator claims for the power of the President, it is very relevant.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; it is not, Mr. President. The question is always one of the reasonable acts of the President in connection with the matter. It is exactly the same way with respect to the constitutionality of any act. It is a question as to whether it may be deemed a reasonable exercise of the power that is granted to him. Whether the cancellation of a debt of $11,000,000,000 would be considered by the Supreme Court of the United States a reasonable exercise of the powers confided to the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, I do not undertake to express an opinion. I should hazard a guess that the Supreme Court would say that it was unreasonable, and therefore beyond the scope of his powers.

Mr. LENROOT. The reason why I asked the Senator this question was this: Has not the Supreme Court laid down very definitely in cases growing out of the Civil War the limitations upon the exercise of such power in case of emergency?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I wanted to advert to that. The Senator from Georgia interrogated me concerning acts passed during the war. The limits of the war power are not specifically defined by the Constitution. It is a field the boundaries of which it is a little difficult to observe with any degree of clarity. It may expand to vast limits under the necessities of the case. The Supreme Court has said that the question to be determined, when Congress passes an act to be justified under the war power, is whether an act of that kind can be reasonably considered as intended for the purpose of carrying on the war and promoting its successful issue. If Congress can reasonably arrive at that conclusion, I understand the Supreme Court to hold that it then falls within the war power, and exactly the same way with respect to the powers of the Commander in Chief. If the Commander in Chief has sold $10,000 worth of stuff to the Republic of France, and had taken their obligations, and in consideration of some reciprocal acts upon their part he had said, "Well, we will call the thing square," I dare say that that could be considered as probably a reasonable act within his powers as Commander in Chief; while if the indebtedness arose as it does here, and it amounted to $10,000,000,000, a different conclusion would arise, namely, that it could not be considered as having reasonably fallen within the scope of his powers as Commander in Chief. That, it seems to me, is the rule applicable at once to the powers of Congress and to the powers of the President of the United States.

So I think, Mr. President, that unless there are some precedents for legislation of this character, dating from some time past, at least, if not reaching back to the time of the adoption of the Constitution or during the lifetime of those who participated in framing it, we must conclude that this is an effort to delegate to Congress the treaty-making power confided by the Constitution to the President and the Senate.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senators in charge of this bill desire a vote on it to-day; and, therefore, out of consideration for them, I shall not occupy as much of the time of the Senate as had been my intention.

Upon my desk this morning I found two significant letters, one from New York and one from a little village near my home in Georgia.

The letter from New York is from a newspaper syndicate, and reads as follows, after the usual address:

> We are engaged in the preparation of a symposium on business reconstruction, through the newspapers of the country, and would appreciate your views in a statement of 500 words or more. In times like these the business men and the public in general throughout the country are anxiously looking to their leaders for counsel. Your expressions of opinion will inspire them.

I hope they will.

You may, if you desire, present your conclusions in answer to this question: "What do you believe business needs to get back to normal?"

The letter from Woodville, Ga., written by a farmer who actually farms outside of the Senate, reads as follows:

What do you think about the finances of the country? Where can farmers secure money with good security? If the farmers can not get money to finance their farms with, they can not farm.

Those letters are typical. Throughout this country, in city and in town and in country, there is more distress to-day than there has been at any time since the panic of 1907. What the people of my State are to do, I frankly confess I do not know. Their condition is desperate, and it is not growing better from month to month. If anything, it is growing worse.

Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] made an elaborate speech which he had reduced to writing, which he revised before publication, and, being dissatisfied with the way the Public Printer had set it up, he revised it again and republished it. Therefore it enjoys the unique distinction of being the only speech that I know of that has appeared twice in our entertaining daily paper, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. From that speech I quote a few lines:

The hostile assaults on the Federal reserve system and its administration have manifestly been so devoid of the truth and so obviously saturated with ignorant prejudice and injustice as to require no answer.

* * * * * * *

What I do say with all the emphasis of which I am capable is that neither malignant nor ignorant misrepresentation will cure the system's defects or render more efficient its administration.

* * * * * * *

No better sanction for such behavior than their own peculiar antipathies or their own pitiful ignorance of the financial transactions upon which they have assumed to comment.

Mr. President, that is very severe language. Frequently here in debate a Senator will use intemperate language, but usually it is stricken out before the record is made up; and not infrequently the Senator who, in the heat of debate, has used rough language, tenders the apology of a gentleman to the Senator who has been offended.

Mr. President, the difficulties of the farmers of the United States can not be cured by listening to the sickening rhetoric of politicians or professional agitators.

* * * * * * *

If some Senators will go home and talk sense to bankers who remain outside the pale of protection, instead of talking nonsense to farmers and arousing prejudice against the Federal reserve banking system, which has afforded them protection, something worth while will be accomplished.

* * * * * * *

Adverting, Mr. President, to the "cruel and murderous" policy of deflation which, as I have shown, never actually had any existence outside the vivid imagination of perplexed politicians.

* * * * * * *

Yet, Mr. President, in the very face of this indisputable evidence, Senators berate the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks with the utterly false charge of ordering and executing a policy of "murderous deflation." Such talk is wicked mummery.

* * * * * * *

Ludicrous misrepresentations.

* * * * * * *

I am one of those who can not conceive that the constitutional immunity granted Senators and Representatives in Congress was ever intended as a shelter for libel of public men or private citizens, leaving them no means of redress.

A Senator deliberately accuses his fellow Senators of screening themselves by constitutional immunities from being prosecuted or sued for damages as a consequence of a libel uttered here on the floor.

Perhaps there are cotton pickers on plantations of the South who may be deceived by such trumpery, but surely there is no Member of the Senate who does not understand how absolutely preposterous these accusations are.

* * * * * * *

While the bank is not to be built in Wall Street, as Senators blathantly declaim, it can not be built in a sage field or a Long Island swamp.

* * * * * * *

In this connection I may recall that in the comedy by Eupolis, called "The Demi," all the demagogues in hell, one by one, are made to come up and pass in review.

Who are those demagogues that come up from hell? They are honorable Senators representing on this floor honorable people, confining themselves, Mr. President, to legitimate subjects and parliamentary language.

Any Senator who discovers his own likeness in the picture is at liberty to appropriate the analogy.

Mr. President, the relations between myself and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] have been exceedingly pleasant, are now so, and I trust will continue to be. No word of mine in the course of what I shall say shall be intended to wound his feelings and to leave a sting. But it is a serious matter for any Senator to be arraigned by a colleague and scathingly denounced in language of that sort. It goes to the country. It becomes a part of the permanent record of the Government. If allowed to remain unrefuted, it brands him as a liar, a charlatan, a demagogue. No self-respecting Senator will allow such language to be used in regard to him and not make a reply, especially when his constituents are suffering untold misery from the evils which have been explained and condemned both by myself and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

We are told that no such thing as deflation or contraction has ever existed except in the vivid imagination of Senators. That is a very positive statement, Mr. President. That is a very bold statement. That statement can not be maintained, and I now intend to explode it.

In the course of his remarks, which show internal evidence of having been most carefully prepared, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] challenged the production of any bulletin or order issued by the Federal Reserve Board looking toward deflation or favoring that policy. Here is the bulletin, one of them, and one is enough. This bulletin was issued by the Federal Reserve Board in Washington May 25, 1920. I read a few sentences from it, since the challenge was flung at myself as well as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] to produce it. Here it is:

Beginning six months ago, the rates of discount on various classes of paper at the Federal reserve banks were advanced. During the latter part of January the present rates were put into effect. These advances, while undoubtedly checking credit transactions which otherwise would have been made, had not been entirely effective in bringing about the reduction in loans desired.

They advanced the discount rates, for what purpose? To reduce credit, to withdraw from circulation the blood necessary to maintain the business body. Further:

The public must be made to realize the necessity of economy in expenditures and in consequence demands for banking credit. The banks themselves are best able to impress the importance of this policy upon the public.

What is the plain meaning of that language, if not that credits must be restricted and that banks must lessen the volume of their loans? Again:

By urging upon member banks through the Federal reserve banks the wisdom of showing borrowers the necessity of curtailment in general credits.

The banks are to put the pressure on other banks, for the very purpose of reducing the amount of money being loaned to those who think they need it.

The board feels assured that the banks of the country now realize the necessity of more conservatism in extending credits and of reasonable reduction in the volume of credits outstanding. The board will not hesitate, so far as it may be necessary, to bring to bear all its statutory powers in regulating the volume of credit, but wishes to point out the more vital problems relating to the movement of the 1920 crop are physical rather than financial. The whole country is suffering from inflation. From reports made by the members of this conference representing every section of the country it is obvious that great sums are tied up in products which if marketed would relieve necessities and tend to reduce the price level and relieve the strain on our credit system.

If that bulletin does not outline the plan to contract the currency, I fail to get its meaning. What has actually happened? The currency has been contracted to the extent of $80,000,000 a month, and where is the man of intelligence who can say that month after month, year after year, we can take out of circulation $80,000,000 every 30 days without causing a convulsion? That is exactly what has happened.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. HEFLIN. In the hearings before the Joint Agricultural Committee in December, 1920, Gov. Harding appeared as a witness. Congressman BYRNES of South Carolina reminded him of a bulletin issued by the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank, in which he said the thing to do was to bring about deflation as rapidly as possible, and Gov. Harding said he thought it was good advice.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I have rarely been more astonished by a speech, here or elsewhere, than I was by the elaborate address of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. For two years the word "deflation" has been in the newspapers and magazines, in interviews, in speeches, and the deflation has notoriously gone on. Gov. Harding had boasted of it. Those who think as he does have bragged about it. Then when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] said that no such thing has taken place, I was genuinely amazed, so much so that, having read in one of the Washington papers the day before Gov. Harding's own statement that during the last 12 months he had withdrawn from circulation $1,000,000,000 of Federal bank notes, I asked the Senator from Virginia what that statement meant.

The Senator answered me, saying the Federal Reserve Board had not retired one dollar; but he went on afterwards and did say that the regional banks had retired the notes, sent them back here to Washington, where they were canceled and destroyed. The regional banks are just so many cogs in the wheel. How does it affect the question that the money was sent in by the regional banks and destroyed by the Federal Reserve Board more than to say the Federal Reserve Board itself did it? Who issued those notes? Not the regionals. The Federal Reserve Board issued them. Who canceled and destroyed the notes? The Federal Reserve Board. Who published the boasting statement that they were carrying the country back to stability by destroying its money? The Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. President, in the Atlanta Constitution of October 9, 1920, there appeared on the front page large headlines relating to an interview given out by Gov. Harding at Birmingham. A subheadline reads as follows:

Gov. Harding emphatically states that bank is not institution for lending money to farmers.

Further, that is stated again and again. An official connected with the department of agriculture of Georgia had gone to Birmingham and pleaded with Gov. Harding for loans to the farmers of my State. He was told, and the fact was published abroad, that the farmers need not expect any help from the Federal Reserve Board. The very next day cotton broke, and went down 114 points. My colleague knows as well as any Senator here knows the disastrous effect upon the material condition of our people by this repeated, continued, distressing policy of contraction, and he knows that our people to-day are in the depth of despair, hardly knowing which way to turn for some gleam of hope.

Mr. President, I am at a loss to know how to start about establishing a thing which the Federal Reserve Board has published as a fact so repeatedly that public sentiment was aroused and a feeling of indignation was taking possession of our people. Yet now we are told by Gov. Harding and those who defend him that no deflation has taken place. Then what has become of the money? The Government reports show that it was in circulation. The Government reports show that it is not now in circulation. What has become of it? It has been canceled and destroyed.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] took me to task for having stated that Gov. Harding drew a salary of $50,000 a year. I was discussing the general extravagance of the Federal Reserve Board administration, and in stating the salary of $50,000, instead of mentioning the name of Gov. Strong, who is getting it, I mentioned the name of Gov. Harding. What difference does it make? The Senator from Virginia said that the law limits the salary of Gov. Harding to $12,000 a year. That is true. Was not that law sufficient notice to the governor of all the banks not to allow the governor of an individual regional bank to draw more than four times as much? Congress set the standard. The highest official, charged with all the responsibilities, was limited to $12,000 a year. That was the opinion of Congress as to the extent to which a salary should go, and it was a warning to Gov. Harding to check the extravagance of the governors of the regionals and not to allow any of them to draw a salary of $50,000 a year. Since the subject is up, and I have virtually been accused of extravagance of statement, I wish to read the actual facts as to the salaries in the reserve bank at New York City.

Benjamin Strong raised his salary from $30,000 to $50,000; Pierre Jay had his salary of $16,000 raised to $30,000; J. H. Case had his salary of $20,000 raised to $30,000. Without wearying the Senate by reading all of the list, I ask permission to insert it in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

The list referred to is as follows:

List of salaries paid to certain officers of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, indicating increases in salaries from the time of their employment, to 1920–21.

(The reserve banks were started in November, 1914.)

Benjamin Strong	$30,000 to $50,000
Pierre Jay	16,000 to 30,000
J. H. Case	20,000 to 30,000
E. R. Kenzel	4,000 to 25,000
L. F. Sailer	$7,000 to 25,000
G. L. Harrison (transferred from Reserve Board to New York Reserve Bank)	4,000 to 22,000
Francis Oakey	20,000
L. H. Hendricks	6,000 to 18,000
H. A. Hopf	18,000
Shepard Morgan	5,000 to 15,000
E. H. Hart	15,000
A. W. Gilbart	1,800 to 12,000
J. D. Higgins	2,500 to 12,000
J. W. Jones	2,500 to 12,000
L. R. Rounds	2,000 to 12,000
J. L. Morris	9,000 to 12,000
W. D. Matteson	1,500 to 10,000
Charles Snyder	12,000
A. J. Lins	1,500 to 10,000
G. E. Chapin	1,500 to 9,000
W. H. Jefferson	3,000 to 8,000
J. E. Crane	1,500 to 7,500
W. H. Hamilton	1,500 to 7,500
R. M. O'Hara	1,500 to 7,500

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the country will be astounded at the profligate waste of public money in these banks. I have in my desk here a circular letter recently issued, issued after my colleague [Mr. HARRIS] had introduced that fine amendment of his designed to place a check upon the extravagance of these regional banks, and one of the best pieces of practical legislation that I have seen put through Congress. In that circular, which was issued in a moment of pique and resentment, apparently, Gov. Harding says that the bankers in New York who are giving themselves this palace, which has been referred to so often in debate here, were using their own money, not Government funds. That statement is not true. Every Senator here knows it is not true. Beyond a certain amount—6 per cent, as I remember—that money belongs to the Government and ought to be covered into the Treasury.

The Senator from Virginia says that the Federal Reserve Board came here and respectfully asked to be allowed $100,000,000, and Congress not only complied with that respectful request but gave them an additional amount. All of us could afford to be very respectful if we were asking for $100,000,000 and expected to get it. That law can be repealed; it should be repealed, and that $100,000,000 should become a part of the funds of the Treasury.

I have also been accused of reckless misstatements in saying that the directors of the New York Federal Reserve Bank had used its funds for their own personal profit. Of course, Mr. President, I have no personal knowledge on the subject, but I quote from the former Comptroller of the Currency, who was the appointee of President Woodrow Wilson, and, like the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], a Virginia gentleman. If the issue of veracity must exist, it shall exist, not between myself and the junior Senator from Virginia, whom I so much regard, but it shall exist between himself and his brother Virginian, John Skelton Williams. Here is what the ex-Comptroller of the Currency of Woodrow Wilson's administration says about it, and that was my authority for making the statement. I thought I could take the word of an official against whose honor no impeachment has been brought; a Comptroller of the Treasury who was in office, as I recall, during the whole eight years of President Wilson's administration. If I am not right about that, I shall be glad to accept a correction. but it seems to me that when President Wilson puts his O. K. upon so important an official as the Comptroller of the Currency, I am warranted in accepting his statement as that of an honorable man and an expert in the matter concerning which he speaks. Here is what he says:

Not only were the funds of the Federal reserve system extensively loaned to banks whose executive officers and directors were big borrowers, but the records show that one of the banks borrowing most heavily from the reserve bank was lending last autumn to a certain large borrower, who at that very time was a director in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, $5,000,000.

That is the charge which John Skelton Williams makes. What motive has he for publishing a statement like that? If it is not true, if he has libeled Gov. Harding or Gov. Strong, he is not protected by the constitutional immunity which protects Senators; he may be sued for damages; he may be prosecuted for libel. Why do they not prosecute John Skelton Williams? He is the president of the Richmond Trust Co., a concern which is capitalized at $1,000,000. Presumably, if a verdict for damages can be obtained against him, it may be collected. If he has made defamatory, libelous statements which are injurious to Gov. Harding and other high-priced officials of the Federal reserve bank, why do they not prosecute him? Why do they not also sue the Manufacturers' Record?

I will not read further from the Manufacturers' Record of September 22, 1921, but there are several different places which

I have marked which contain a repetition of that charge, and I ask unanimous consent that I may insert them as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, that will be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

5. Not only were the funds of the Federal reserve system extensively loaned to banks whose executive officers and directors were big borrowers but the records show that one of the banks borrowing most heavily from the reserve bank was lending last autumn to a certain large borrower who at that very time was also a director of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, over $5,000,000 (including a dummy loan of over $3,000,000), mostly on highly speculative securities, while farmers and the "country" banks were even then begging for relief and enduring ruinous losses because of the credit restrictions of the reserve system.

6. The official figures show that in September, 1920, the reserve system was actually lending to the 45 national banks in the three big cities of New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, about $300,000,000 more than the system was lending at the same time to the 7,673 "country" banks in all the 48 States of the Union.

7. At the beginning of August, 1920, national banks in New York City which were borrowing heavily from the Federal reserve bank were lending for correspondents on so-called Wall Street loans, largely for stock speculations, over $500,000,000 coaxed thither by the high rates speculators would pay.

12. About January 1, 1920, the New York reserve bank was lending an amount equal to nearly six times its own capital—that is, six times the capital of the reserve bank of New York—to one member institution. This one borrower was thus getting nearly twice as much from the reserve system as the aggregate amount of loans and discounts which the Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas at that time was lending to all of its member banks in that great district, including Texas, and parts of Louisiana, Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona.

The newspapers say that Gov. Strong, of the Reserve Bank of New York, tried before the congressional committee to explain the loan of $130,000,000 to this institution on the ground that the borrower held $112,000,000 Government securities, but this excuse won't do, for in my letter to the governor of the Federal Reserve Board of January 28, 1920, I pointed out that according to the bank's own sworn report the total amount of Liberty bonds and United States certificates owned by that institution was less than $26,000,000. Gov. Strong should be more careful.

The loans to a bank's officers are sometimes made at reduced or "family" interest rates, carried indefinitely and not "called," while other borrowers engaged in legitimate and productive business are required to make peremptory payments, regardless of the sacrifice, and sometimes the ruin, which the compliance with the banks' demands may involve.

If the officers of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York granted these huge accommodations knowing the use to which certain of these institutions were putting the funds under their command their officers were culpable for aiding and abetting in a misuse of Federal reserve money. If they made these enormous and exceptional loans without being informed as to the use which was being made of the money, and without an independent examination of the borrower, after the repeated warnings which the Comptroller of the Currency had given to the Federal Reserve Board that such an examination ought to be made, they are guilty of gross negligence. There is no escape from these conclusions.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Let me hurry on. Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States does not defame anybody; it does not publish libels about anybody. In a decision rendered at the October term, 1920—the actual date of the decision being March 16, 1921—they distinctly hold that the Federal reserve banks have been waging warfare upon legitimate creations of the States—meaning what? They have been, by a systematic gathering up of drafts and presenting them at the banks' windows, $30,000 or $40,000 of them at one time, endeavoring to ruin those banks, and in many cases they have done so. The Federal reserve system intends to draw every bank into its vortex, unless it becomes a member of the system. There is no doubt about it in the world. State banks have gone crashing to the wall by the score all over this country and national banks even are failing. They are virtually compelled to join the Federal reserve system or to stay out at their peril.

Mr. President, the other day I mentioned here the Georgia Railroad Bank, a member of the Federal reserve system. I mentioned the fact that I had been a patron of that bank, had been under obligations to it for accommodations for the last 40 years, and that ever since my brother and I established a little State bank at Thomson for the accommodation of the poorer classes of borrowers we had done business with the Georgia Railroad Bank, and had never failed to secure advances, but, finding ourselves carrying $70,000 of farm paper and not desiring to embarrass or to injure any of our customers by foreclosing on them, we had applied in the usual way to the Georgia Railroad Bank for accommodation. The president wrote back, "We can not advance a dollar on farm paper. If you will indorse a note and have the directors also indorse it, we will lend to the bank on your personal indorsement, but not on your farm paper." That very president has written to the Manufacturers' Record a letter which will be found in the last issue of that standard publication. His name is Jacob Phinizy, former president of the Georgia Railroad as well as of the Georgia Railroad Bank, and he writes to the Manufacturers' Record a letter in which he indorses all that the Manufacturers' Record has said against the Federal reserve system and its remorseless and criminal contraction of the currency. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] used the word "murderous," and that term is not too strong, for, indeed, that policy has caused men to murder themselves, and God only knows how many men have been driven to crimes that resulted in murder by the remorseless policy of the Federal reserve banks. But it is a significant thing that so conservative a bank and railroad president as Jacob Phinizy should write to the Manufacturers' Record condemning the contraction policy of the Federal Reserve Board.

But we are told that there has been no contraction. Why, Mr. President, you can not take a single circulation statement issued by the Government without seeing it. From the statement of May 1, 1921, which I pick up at haphazard, it appears that on May 1, 1920, the amount of Federal reserve notes was over $3,000,000,000, while on the corresponding date of last year, May 1, 1921, it had fallen to $2,700,000,000. Take up any of those statements and see for yourselves and be convinced.

Mr. President Prof. Gustave Cassell, of the University of Stockholm, Sweden, says that the terrible policy of our Federal Reserve Board is largely responsible for the frightful conditions in Europe. It has been a long time since I have read anything more impressive than the analysis which Prof. Cassell makes of the European influence of this American policy of taking up the gold of the world and heaping it up into a useless reserve.

Some time ago in speaking of this matter I mentioned that the gold reserve here had reached $2,800,000,000, and was climbing steadily toward $3,000,000,000. It has reached that height and passed it. Where is it to stop? The whole gold supply of the world is supposed to amount to something like $10,000,000,000, and we have already drawn into this useless heap of gold nearly one-third of it, and within a few days or a few weeks it will be quite one-third. What is the meaning of all this? What is to be done with that gold, every dollar of which should be in the fields of industry, giving men work, giving them products, giving them hope, giving them happier homes. An insaner policy was never known.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] says that they contracted the currency because prices had begun to decline. Just the reverse is true; just the reverse is always true. All things being equal, the prices follow the volume of currency. If the currency inflates, prices inflate; if the currency contracts, prices contract; up with your currency, up go prices; down with your currency, and down go prices. That is the financial history of the world.

I noticed that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] in discussing this greatest of all economic questions, the money question, did not cite a single authority in support of his contention. Why? Because he could not do so. The Senator talks about challenges; I will challenge him, a bit good-naturedly and with great respect, produce your authorities to the contrary; produce the authority which says that the reduction of prices causes a reduction of the volume of currency. You can not prove it by Adam Smith; you can prove just the contrary. You can not prove it by Ricardo; you can prove just the contrary. You can not prove it by Aristotle, or Lycurgus, or Solon; you will prove just the contrary. Every panic that we ever had resulted from the contraction of the currency. You can not name a single one that did not result from it; I challenge the Senator from Virginia to name a single panic that was not intimately and immediately connected with the contraction of the currency.

Mr. President, the Senator says that the panic of 1907 was the worst we ever had. He was too young to have gone through the panic of 1873, but I was not. Compared with the panic of 1873 that of 1907 was a mild whisper among the leaves made by a wandering breeze. What made the panic of 1907? The New York bankers calling the money; they would not allow it to circulate. President Roosevelt did me the honor to invite me to conference with him at the White House. I accepted the invitation; I went to the White House; I conferred with the Secretary of the Treasury and with the President. I pointed out to him what, in my judgment, would have broken that corner and put the money into circulation and thus ended the panic. My remedy was simple. Under the act of 1863, authorizing the issue of greenbacks, there was still authority—and it exists now—to issue $102,000,000 of greenbacks; and I said to Mr. Roosevelt, "Mr. President, if you will even make a motion to carry out that law, the Morgan crowd will turn loose that money"; but he frankly said, "I do not understand the money question"; and he took advice from Mr. Cortelyou.

What caused the panic of 1893? The bankers gave the country an "object lesson," and forced the repeal of the Sherman silver law. That is all there was to it. It can be proven to a mathematical certainty that they did do it on purpose, and they got what they went after. They usually get what they go after.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] says that during the last 50 years we have had a panic-breeding system of finance, meaning, of course, the national bank system.

Mr. President, I am a Jeffersonian Democrat, an Andrew Jackson Democrat, a Tom Benton Democrat. I am opposed to national banks. I think the Government ought to retain unto itself the sovereign power to create money and control the volume of it. It is a sovereign power, as truly so as the power to declare war and to make peace. It ought never to be surrendered to private institutions for private gain; but when the Senator from Virginia arraigned the authors of the national bank act, I wonder if he realized how many great men he was accusing of having established a panic-breeding money system. Abraham Lincoln signed the national bank act on June 4, as I remember, 1864. It was devised by Mr. Chase, Mr. Spalding, and others. During all the time of its existence it was never assailed by such men as Sherman, nor Sumner, nor Fessenden, nor Lamar of Mississippi, nor Morgan of Alabama, nor any of the Senators who represented Virginia; but the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], in stating his views, takes issue with Thomas Jefferson, takes issue with James Madison, takes issue with Edmund Randolph. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] elevates himself to the highest promontory of his solitary island in the midst of the ocean of authorities, and, like Alexander Selkirk, is "monarch of all he surveys."

The figures show that before this deflation set in, there were more than $50 per capita in circulation. The figures now show $36 per capita, and half of that ought to be stricken out. Why? Because it does not circulate. Four hundred and fifty million dollars of it consists of national bank reserves. Six hundred and twenty million dollars of it is in the vaults of State banks and trust companies. Nearly a thousand million dollars of it is in the reserves of the Federal reserve banks. Then take the amount that is kept in the cash drawers of every retail store in America; take the amount that is hidden away in secret hoards by those of a miserly disposition; take that which we keep on our persons among the 110,000,000 people in America; think then of what a colossal sum is being kept out of circulation, and how comparatively little is in actual circulation.

Mr. President, I could say a great deal more, but I promised not to occupy too much time. It is a subject which I can resume at some later date. I wish the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] would take a view of the statement which appears in this morning's paper as to the earnings of the Richmond Federal Reserve Bank and of their contraction of the currency and of credits. These banks are making over 100 per cent profit, and the Government report shows it. My position is that this is the Government itself operating through these banks, and that a Government furnishing the people with money and doing so on terms which net 100 per cent clear profit is guilty of a crime against those people and prostituting the power of the Government to the ruin of the unprotected outsiders. No country can stand for any considerable period such enormous usury as that.

Everybody knows that the principle hidden in the compound-interest tables would devour the human race if not checked. Here you have that principle of compound interest applied against our people by a governmental agency. It will roll over from year to year; the surplus will be continuous, the profits will be continuous, and our people will suffer more and more. Unless the Federal Reserve Board is compelled to reverse its policy, and that soon, our country need not look for any permanent improvement in material conditions.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, following the able speech of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], I desire to read a telegram from a prominent citizen and business man of New Orleans. The telegram came last night to Hon. John S. Wannamaker, president of the American Cotton Association, and he gave it to me to-day. It reads as follows:

Think it would be most beneficial, not only to agricultural interests but to business at large, to advocate law which would compel Federal Reserve Board to attend to its own legitimate business, and prohibit it from entering the field of propaganda, market forecasts, price dope, and interference with business generally, as it did with disastrous results in the late deflation campaign. Business confidence can not be restored so long as this board, which is the most powerful force for good or harm in the United States, assumes and exercises the authority to regulate commodity prices and management of business. No man will embark in reconstruction enterprises so long as this board assumes and exercises the authority to put him out of business at will.

W. B. THOMPSON.

Mr. President, I am reminded that a little while back the Federal Reserve Board gave out a forecast as to what the cotton crop would be. It meddles in various subjects. It frequently suggests that legislation on various lines should be had up here. It gets out a propaganda that will injuriously affect farm-product prices. This estimate that the Federal Reserve Board gave out a little while back broke the price of cotton in the neighborhood of $5 a bale that day or the day following; so Mr. Thompson is right in the suggestion that he makes in his telegram to the president of the American Cotton Association. Right in keeping with the very timely speech of the able Senator from Georgia, I desire to state that the deflation policy that this board has carried on for months and months has wrought ruin in the South and West; and I wanted this telegram to come at this time, following the speech of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. Thompson speaks the truth when he says that the Federal Reserve Board has power to be of great good or of great harm to the country. The instrumentalities that we placed in its hands when we passed the law bringing the Federal reserve system into being were never intended to be used as instrumentalities of torture and plunder. They were intended to be used as beneficial and helpful instruments reaching out to serve the needs of the people. In time of distress, and when the people needed money most, it was intended that through this system money should be supplied. If the system had to put out more currency and extend more credits to prevent the ruin of American agriculture it was its duty to do so. That was the purpose of the system; but, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] has pointed out, at the time that our people needed money and credits most, this Federal Reserve Board's policy drew them in, contracted the currency, deflated credits, destroyed property values, and produced a widespread destructive panic in the South and West.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I offered to the pending bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I was not in the Chamber when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] began his speech, but I note that he made reference to the fact that my speech in defense of the Federal reserve banking system appeared twice in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as if to signify that I thought it was worthy of a double insertion in the RECORD. The real fact is that the Public Printer, through mistake, in the first place, ascribed about 25 per cent of my speech to the distinguished senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE].

Mr. HEFLIN. And he would not stand for it?

Mr. GLASS. I was about to say what the Senator from Alabama so eagerly said for me, that I thought perhaps the Senator from Ohio would not be willing to assume responsibility for my speech, and, therefore, I had it corrected and reinserted in the RECORD. Of course, the Senator from Ohio or any other Senator would gladly welcome responsibility for the extraordinary speech just made by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I hope I may be allowed to say in one sentence that the Senators who were present will remember that I stated that the Senator from Virginia was dissatisfied with the way in which the Public Printer had inserted his speech in the RECORD, and, therefore, he had reprinted it. I made that explanation at the time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to call the attention of Senators to the fact that while we have been in session since 12 o'clock, nearly three hours and a half, we have had only a few minutes discussion of the pending measure. While we all realize how helpless one is who has charge of a bill in his desire to have the discussion limited to that bill, I know there are many Senators who would like to have the matter finished this afternoon, to the end that we might adjourn over until Monday. I merely desire to say now that if it is impossible to conclude it to-day, and if we are compelled to let it go over until to-morrow, I shall ask for an evening session, if it becomes necessary, in order to complete the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerks advise the Chair that the amendment the Senator from North Carolina desires to have laid before the Senate is an amendment to come in at the end of the second section.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; the amendment I offered this morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that that is an amendment to an amendment which had already been agreed to. It will therefore be necessary to reconsider the vote by which the amendment already agreed to was adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the amendment already agreed to will be considered as having been reconsidered.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not desire to reconsider what has already been agreed to, but whenever we get ready to vote upon the Senator's amendment I will say to the Senator that he can restate his amendment, and there will be no difficulty in so arranging it that a vote may be had upon it while we are in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina asked that the amendment should be presented to the Senate at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. My only purpose was in order to direct the attention of the Senate at once to the amendment and, as far as possible, to foreclose the general discussion. I desired to get some specific proposition before the body with a view to accomplishing that object.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I ask that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina be read, but I do not like to agree at this time to reconsider what we have already agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Amend the committee amendment at the foot of page 2 by inserting after the words "4½ per cent per annum," a comma and the words "payable semiannually or annually in accordance with the provisions of existing law."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask for a reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to?

Mr. SIMMONS. In view of the statement of the Senator from North Dakota I do not think it necessary to do that at this time. I would prefer doing it, but as the Senator objects at this time, I will not insist upon it.

Mr. REED. The amendment can be considered now unless some one makes a point of order against it. It simply comes in as an amendment to the text as it is now perfected.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it would be better if the Senator from North Dakota would permit the reconsideration to take place now and let the amendment be offered.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only point was, if the Senator will allow me, that in the amendment adopted we have agreed upon the form, and without any objection from either side.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am making none now.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am referring to the amendment already offered and agreed to. I do not desire to open up that subject again.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not trying to open it up.

Mr. McCUMBER. A reconsideration would make it subject to further amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not trying to open it up. That is not my purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. I know the Senator does not intend to do so, but if we reconsider the matter now it would open up the whole subject again. I wish the Senator would consent to allow it to be read and take my assurance that whenever he wants a vote on it he will have the opportunity.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	La Follette	Page
Ball	Hale	Lenroot	Pepper
Borah	Harris	McCumber	Phipps
Broussard	Heflin	McKellar	Pittman
Calder	Hitchcock	McKinley	Poindexter

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in its importance can not be overestimated. It may seem at a casual glance not really to warrant much discussion, but those of us who are familiar with the progress of the pending bill through the committee fully understand that in the words proposed to be inserted by the Senator from North Carolina is wrapped up the question whether the Secretary of the Treasury shall have authority to settle $11,000,000,000 of loans on just such terms and conditions as may please him.

I do not know, Mr. President, whether it is worth my time or the patience of any Senator to discuss a measure which I understand has received caucus attention by the other side of the Chamber. Whenever a body of men can get themselves into a frame of mind such as passed the Newberry resolution, it occurs to me that the day of argument and appeal to reason has ended. I had the misfortune to be absent when that resolution was adopted. I was, however, paired against it and all similar asininities and criminalities. I only refer to it now because I think it is really pertinent to the question whether there is any use in submitting any argument to the majority of the Senate upon its merits, either of fact or logic.

The resolution seating TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY, as drawn by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] and adorned by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], reads as follows:

Resolved, (1) That the contest of Henry Ford against Truman H. Newberry be, and it is hereby, dismissed.

(2) That Truman H. Newberry is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan for the term of six years commencing on the 4th day of March, 1919, and is entitled to hold his seat in the Senate of the United States.

(3) That whether the amount expended in this primary was $195,000, as was fully reported or openly acknowledged, or whether there were some few thousand dollars in excess, the amount expended was in either case too large, much larger than ought to have been expended.

The expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent, being contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, and dangerous to the perpetuity of a free Government, such excessive expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved.

Surely, whenever a body of men get ready to say that "the amount expended in a primary election was $195,000 or an amount in excess of that"; that the amount expended was "much larger than ought to have been expended," and therefore the man should be seated; whenever they are prepared to say further that "the expenditure of such excessive sums in behalf of a candidate, either with or without his knowledge and consent," is "contrary to sound public policy," and therefore the man should be seated; whenever a body of men are prepared to say that the expenditure of such sum of money was "harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate," and therefore the man ought to be given a seat in the Senate; whenever the majority is prepared to say that the expenditure of the sum of money referred to was "dangerous to the perpetuity of free government," and therefore in the interest of the perpetuity of free government they will consummate the crime by giving its beneficiary a seat in the Senate; whenever we find the morals of the majority so lax that it can declare in one breath "that such expenditures are hereby severely condemned and disapproved," but the election of the man thereby accomplished is hereby commended and approved—whenever we find that sort of a conscience and that kind of logic, we know that caucus action having been taken on any bill the time for debate and appeal to reason, conscience, or decency is at an end.

I unhesitatingly say, sir, that in all the annals of all the legislative bodies that have ever existed upon the face of the earth, there never has been so shameless a resolution adopted; there never has been so bold a publication of the infamy of those who voted for the resolution. In the common parlance of the law we often speak of a plea in confession and avoidance, which means, in plain language, that the charge made is admitted; but there is brought in as a defense or excuse a good and sufficient reason for the doing of the act; but this is not a plea of confession and avoidance; it is a plea of confession and ratification.

I do not believe that the rank and file of the Republican Party will indorse such a resolution when they learn its import. Indeed, there is a foretaste of their feelings and sympathy in the action of the nine Republican Senators who voted against the seating of TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY. But, Mr. President, there is not a Senator who voted for this resolution who did not brand in red letters above and over and across his political record the word "dishonor." There is no language human tongue can utter or pen can indite that will adequately express the degradation of that resolution—the self-confessed degradation of those who supported it.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missiuri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. CARAWAY. If I may be permitted, I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he may be bringing down upon himself some kind of punishment, because the author of that very brilliant resolution, if the newspapers are correct, is now in favor of a cloture rule to confine all Senators to speak to the question before the Senate. I do not blame that Senator for wanting such a rule, because were I similarly situated I should want that thing to be a closed incident. However, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the fact that such a rule is now probably being considered.

Mr. REED. I only refer to this subject now in connection with the matter which is in hand, Mr. President, because I am about to address myself directly to the bill in question, and I understand a party caucus has been held and the votes that are to be cast have already been agreed upon and dictated.

I wish, Mr. President, that the Newberry resolution could be printed in 110,000,000 copies and pasted on the footboard of every bed in America, so that every man, woman, and child when they awaken in the morning and get through saying their usual prayers for the rest of creation may invoke Almighty God to forgive the men who voted that the acts done by NEWBERRY were of a kind "calculated to endanger the Republic," and then voted to ratify his acts and to seat him in the United States Senate.

I repeat—and I intend often to repeat in this body—that it was the most stupid piece of business that ever disgraced any body of men, whether they were pirates sailing the seas under a black flag or dignified statesmen seated in this Chamber charged to protect a great country. The gentleman sailing under the "Jolly Roger" at least had a philosophy and was consistent. He said:

> We follow still the good old rule,
> The very simple plan,
> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

He made his victims walk the plank, expecting to also walk the plank when he was captured. He did not pretend to be anything but a pirate; he ran up his skull and crossbone flag, ground his saber, took to the high seas as a marauder and a criminal.

But here is a distinguished body of men who solemnly resolve that a thing is wrong, who protest to high heaven that their conscience is outraged and their souls are harrowed by the mere thought of what has happened, and who, having thus indulged in sanctimonious and hypocritical recitation, proceed to ratify all that was done.

What a miserable, stupid, idiotic thing it was! If they had said, "We believe that Mr. NEWBERRY was elected and that, without his knowledge or consent, this money was expended, therefore he shall stand acquit," they would have at least been able to make some sort of pretense that they were deceived by the evidence; if they had said that "the money was expended, but there was no law against it," and "therefore no penalty could be visited upon Mr. NEWBERRY," they would at least have been consistent. But they stand here declaring the thing is infamous, detrimental to the State, an insult to the Senate, "therefore we hereby solemnly ratify and confirm it."

When you get out your campaign books, gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber who supported the Newberry resolution, allow me to suggest to you that you print that resolution on the title-page; that you make it the first plank in your political platform; that you repeat it at the top of the various pages of the book; and that you accompany it with the statement, "This is a verbal picture of the Republican conscience as it exists in the Senate in the year 1922." You should add, "We knew the seating of NEWBERRY was wrong; we knew it was wicked; we knew it was injurious to the State; we knew it was an insult to the Senate; therefore we ratified it."

Why, Mr. President, the tongue is paralyzed in an effort to describe a thing like that. If it was wrong, why did you not wipe out the effect of the wrong and not adopt it?

You say, "This thing that crawls, and has a forked tongue and crooked teeth, is a poison serpent. Therefore we will admit it to the family circle and allow it to wind its folds about the bodies of our children."

You say, "This is a dog with the rabies. Every time he sinks his fangs into the flesh they carry with them deadly disease. Therefore we will turn the dog loose on the community."

You say, "This is a thing black with infamy. Therefore we will spread it as a mantle over the Senate Chamber."

You say, "This is a deadly leprosy that, introduced into the body politic, will destroy the virtue of the Nation. Therefore we will introduce it into the Senate.

You say, "This office was sold for money. Therefore he who bought it shall be confirmed in his title."

You say, "The thing is crimson in its crime, and reeking rotten in all its parts. Therefore its originator and beneficiary shall be seated in the Senate Chamber to vote on bills concerning the welfare of the States."

You who supported the resolution wrote the creed yourselves. You made your own declaration. You diagrammed your own act. You branded it with your own words. You wrote the epitaph of decency in this body, and you have preserved it for all time in the records of the State. So there is not much use in arguing questions after caucus action, no matter what the merits of the question may be.

A new word ought to be introduced into our tongue—a phrase that would describe this sort of thing that has happened—"a Newberryism." It will, however, not serve much use, for the thing I have described has never happened before, and it never will happen again; there will never appear upon the face of this earth another band of gentlemen who will set down in cold type that "the thing is bad, wicked, dangerous to the State, therefore we do that thing; therefore we ratify it, we confirm it, we sanctify it."

Think of the judge of a court saying: "I hereby find the defendant guilty of murder; therefore I discharge him in his guilt with the blessings of the court."

Think of the judge of a court convicting a man of theft and then declaring: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that he shall keep the goods and chattels he has stolen."

Think of a judge trying a case of fraud and reciting: "Be it ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendant has been guilty of fraud and false representation, and that he has cheated his neighbor of his goods, wares, and chattels in the sum of $100,000; but be it further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that he shall be confirmed in his title thereto."

What is the use of argument under those circumstances? This resolution will make a great political platform, so it seems to me, for the Senator who wrote it. And they say, "He wrote it all alone!" [Laughter.] In the State of Ohio this ought to be a great political platform.

It was said some years ago that there was one county in Ohio—I never believed it, but it may be true—where a majority of the people had been guilty of selling their votes in an election. I suggest that the Willis-Spencer Newberry resolution ought to be very popular in that county. The Senator ought to get all the votes there are there. You see, it is so consistent with the state of morals charged. I can imagine him making a speech to that kind of a crowd and saying: "You know election day is the day when we recoup our fortunes. Then it is we make the rich yield us a portion of their savings. Then it is every man gets five or ten dollars for his vote." Now, that trade can not prosper, that industry can not thrive, if we do not permit the man who buys the votes to receive the fruits of his purchase. To that end I introduced into the Senate and had passed and ratified a resolution which declared in the Newberry case that—> the expenditure of such excessive amounts in behalf of the candidate, either with or without his knowledge, is contrary to sound public policy, harmful to the honor and dignity of the Senate, dangerous to the perpetuity of free government, and is hereby severely condemned and disapproved: Wherefore be it

> Resolved, That TRUMAN H. NEWBERRY is hereby declared to be a duly elected Senator from the State of Michigan.

Why, when that was written, if the gods in heaven had been malicious, if they had for the moment been controlled by evil influences from the nether regions, they would have looked over the battlements of the skies and roared with laughter that would have shaken the universe.

I feel I ought to congratulate the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS] upon this wonderful piece of political ethics and modern statesmanship. I have not any doubt that when he runs again all the billboards in Ohio will have this resolution in large letters, and above it will be inscribed the words: "Written by himself. He wrote it all alone." [Laughter.]

I think I once told in this Chamber the pathetic story of little Alexander, as recited by Bill Nye.

Little Alexander was a poodle dog with an insatiate appetite. So controlled was he by his desire to eat that he neither stopped to taste nor to smell. Observing one day a pan filled with a white fluid that resembled milk, he greedily swallowed it all in a few gulps, only to discover that it was liquid plaster of Paris. Of course, the inevitable happened. It solidified inside of little Alexander, and he died. A cruel stranger tossed his body off in the bushes. The elements dissolved the flesh and skin and hair, and a few years afterwards the little child who had owned the dog and loved it found the remains. There was the skeleton, and there was a complete reproduction in plaster of paris of the entire internal anatomy of the dog. She took it home, put it tenderly upon the mantelpiece, and wrote this epitaph over it: "Little Alexander: An inside view, taken by himself." [Laughter.]

This is an inside view, taken by the Republican majority itself, save for those few Senators whom I have already excepted. It wrote it down. It preserved it. It said: "This is our philosophy. This is our creed. This is the measure of our moral horizon. This we do in order to save one vote in the Senate, even temporarily."

So I repeat, Mr. President, there is not much use in arguing questions which concern merely such matters as the expenditure of $11,000,000,000.

Coming to that interesting question, there is scant hope in trying to disguise the fact that what the Secretary of the Treasury wants, what he has demanded from the first, is unlimited power to do as he pleases with reference to the foreign debt. The first bill that was introduced expressly provided:

That the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized from time to time—to refund or convert, and to extend the time of payment of the principal or the interest, or both, of any obligation of any foreign Government now owing to the United States of America, or any obligation of any foreign Government hereafter received by the United States of America (including obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation), arising out of the European war, into bonds or other obligations of such, or of any other, foreign Government, and from time to time to receive bonds and obligations of any foreign Government in substitution for those now or hereafter held by the United States of America, in such form and of such terms, conditions, date or dates of maturity, and rate or rates of interest, and with such security, if any, as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America, and to adjust and settle any and all claims, not now represented by bonds or obligations, which the United States of America now has or hereafter may have against any foreign Government and to accept securities therefor.

Mr. President, in a word, that provision sought to give the Secretary of the Treasury the right to take any kind of securities, at any rate of interest, at any time of maturity, he saw fit; to take the securities of the Governments owing the United States, or, in lieu of those securities, to take the securities of any other Government. It gave him the right to settle unadjusted claims. It also gave him the right to change and interchange and rechange these securities at will at any time, at any place, at any rate.

I do not want to use a single harsh expression in what I am about to say, for the Senate well knows how gentle I am of speech by nature and how I dislike to say anything of a personal character.

I really do dislike to say anything of a personal character; but that is the most impudent proposal ever put before a legislative body—that there should be placed in the hands of a single man the right to deal as he pleased with a debt of $11,000,000,000. Yet it was the demand made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and insisted upon before the committee. He insisted that nothing else would do; that he must be given a free hand. Indeed, there was carefully wrapped up in the instrument the right, if he had seen fit, to give us German bonds in lieu of British bonds, to give us German bonds in lieu of French bonds, to give us German or Russian bonds in lieu of the bonds of Italy. I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that, in my opinion, it was the fixed purpose of the Treasury Department to begin that very sort of juggling, and that it was part of a common plan ultimately to destroy these debts and ultimately to bring about a state of affairs which would result in a forgiving of the debts by the United States.

Bear in mind as we consider this question that European Governments have officially asked that that very thing be done. If they have not done it through their regular channels, they have nevertheless made such proposals persistently through irregular channels. The scheme is not yet at an end. The purpose is still in their hearts. If they can not secure the absolute forgiving of the debts by the United States, then they want to do the next best thing, to postpone the payment of the interest and the payment of the principal as many years as possible, always understanding that the longer a debt can be postponed without interest the more likelihood there is of ultimately escaping the obligation.

I have a clipping, a recent one, dated September 27, a London telegram, reading as follows:

BRITAIN FEARS TALK OF DEBTS—DISCUSSION OF CANCELLATION BY ARMS CONFERENCE IS OPPOSED.

LONDON, September 27.

The British Government is opposed to any discussion of the cancellation of the Allies' war debts to the United States at the Washington conference. This information was obtained from an official source to-day.

It was explained that British officials fear discussion of debt cancellation would create a bad impression in the United States. British officials profess to believe a majority of the members of President Harding's Cabinet favor consideration of the international debt question, but they say they recognize that "popular opinion in America is opposed to any movement toward the repudiation of the debts."

That is only a telegram from London, but that this proposition has been discussed and seriously discussed no honest man who is informed will deny. The argument they put forward is that their sacrifices in the war were greater than ours, that we should have come in the first day of the war instead of at the time we did, that they bore the brunt of the war for all those years, and that therefore the United States should now come in and contribute this stupendous sum of money. The propaganda in favor of this doctrine has had its advocates in America. Some of the most prominent bankers of the United States have boldly set it before the people and have proclaimed it as the only means of rejuvenating Europe. It has had an advocate in at least one member of the President's Cabinet, unless he has been misquoted in the newspapers, and I never saw his denial. It has beeen advocated by a great many of the uplifters and reformers who have been talking to us constantly about our duty to mankind abroad.

The reason for the advocacy of this doctrine is not difficult to find. There are five or six billion dollars loaned in Europe by bankers and capitalists of the United States. We are told that Europe is bankrupt—a thing I desire to discuss in a moment—but that, Europe being bankrupt, we can, of course, place her upon her feet by the cancellation of this enormous debt due the United States Government. Now, it does not need any seer, any prophet, any man of marvelous acumen, to know that the average New York banker—the Morgan group, if you please—having loaned three or four or five billion dollars in Europe to countries which they now say are bankrupt, of course understand that if we cancel our $11,000,000,000 debt their $5,000,000,000 debt will immediately become a good debt. It does not take very much sense for any man to know that if he has $100,000 worth of property and owes $150,000 of money, and owes $125,000 of that to one man, and if that man will forgive that debt the gentleman with the $25,000 balance of the debt can collect his money.

Allied with this argument is the one that we are in duty bound to put Europe upon her feet, that we should create an international bank and we should finance them through an international bank, Uncle Sam of course to furnish the money. So I say there has been a consistent and determined effort from the first to induce the United States to sacrifice the whole of its debt, or at least a material part of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. REED. With pleasure.

Mr. SIMMONS. In connection with the very forceful argument the Senator has just made to the effect that if we forgive this debt it would enable the bankers who have loaned $5,000,000,000 better to collect that, I wish to ask the Senator if the same argument does not apply to the long extension of the interest? If the interest is extended for a long period of time, if we are to collect neither principal nor interest for a course of years, I think the Secretary mentioned 10 years, would that not give these private holders of obligations against European Governments the first opportunity to collect their indebtedness, and would it not be virtually postponing our national debt in the interest of these private debts?

Mr. REED. Certainly that is true. I was gradually leading up to that point, but it has been very well stated by the Senator from North Carolina.

Now, Mr. President, the first step taken by these Governments was to secure a postponement of the collection of interest for the first two or three years. No Secretary of the Treasury had the right to postpone that interest. No President of the United States had the right to defer it. No one had such a right. But some negotiations had taken place with reference to having bonds written and delivered in the manner and form contemplated by the original act. In those negotiations some suggestion was made by a British statesman that it was desirable that the interest should not be collected for two years or, better than that, three years. Some one of the negotiators upon our side in some way or other appeared to give an assent, which was immediately treated as a contract. As a result, not a penny of interest has been paid except, I believe, in one or two instances, where I believe without question the interest was paid out of money they borrowed from us.

Bearing these things in mind and understanding the original demand of the Secretary of the Treasury, I desire to add one thing further, and I do it with very great regret. I feel that it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the environment and surrounding of the Secretary of the Treasury. The stream never rises higher than its fountain source. Every man is a creature of environment. All the circumstances of our lives control the currents of our thoughts. Without challenging the honesty of any man, we nevertheless have the right, when we undertake to estimate his course of action, to look somewhat into the conditions of his life and into the character and nature of the investments he has made in the world as he has gone along.

In Current Opinion for April, 1921, is an eulogistic article of the Secretary of the Treasury, from which I read, as follows:

It is the testimony of his friends that the new Secretary of the Treasury possesses a vision as broad and far-reaching as his insight into the process of business is keen. As to the proofs that this Pittsburgh financier, reputed to be richer than Carnegie or Frick was, and second in wealth only to John D. Rockefeller, unites administrative capacity with vision, we are told that practically all his greatest enterprises were brought to him on paper. He visualized their possibilities and risked his own money to make them go. One of them, the Aluminum Co. of America, is the largest concern of its kind in the world.

The statement might have been made that it is the only one.

He is said to be the only man who ever fought Standard Oil successfully, and the Gulf Oil Co. stands as a monument to his courage. At Niagara Falls exists a great carborundum plant as a reminder that capital never saw anything in carborundum until Mellon, of Pittsburgh, developed its possibilities. He founded the New York Shipbuilding Co., which he afterwards sold, now a concern of gigantic proportions. He took the Union Trust Co., of Pittsburgh, when it was regarded as "a scrap of paper" and created an institution with resources of $133,500,000 and a surplus of $39,000,000. The record of the personal activities of Secretary Mellon includes 4 banks, of 1 of which he recently resigned the presidency to enter the Cabinet; 4 insurance companies; 7 educational and philanthropic institutions; and 62 other corporations. Their products—oil, aluminum, railway cars, locomotives, steel, plate glass, radiators, carborundum, bolts and rivets, motor trucks, and a hundred other things—go all over the world. The Mellon National Bank of Pittsburgh, apparently a pet enterprise, has resources of $132,000,000 and deposits aggregating $105,000,000, and its moving spirit has the reputation of never having "gypped" anybody out of a share of stock in his life. The concerns in which he was actively interested prior to March 4 have resources in excess of $800,000,000.

* * * * * * *

Even Pennsylvania may not have realized until recently that the wealth of the Mellons rivals that of the Rockefellers. It is related in this connection that when Mellon was first mentioned for a Cabinet portfolio the President elect was deluged with letters from officers and stockholders of dozens of banks in small Ohio towns urging his selection as Secretary of the Treasury. These letters caused some surprise, and at first were suspected to be propaganda. "Not at all," explained a man who knew the source of their inspiration. "Mr. Mellon is ignorant of these communications; but the Mellon National Bank has been very successful in securing the deposits of hundreds of country banks, and these banks have been treated with such generosity and fairness as to indicate to their officers and stockholders the virtues of Mellon, and now they want Harding to know about him."

Mr. President, in that connection and as a part of this story of influence, I call attention to a communication dated November 1, 1921. Here is a resolution "unanimously indorsed by the undersigned manufacturers and their employees of western Pennsylvania and is respectfully submitted for your consideration." It is addressed to me as a member of the Finance Committee. I print the letter complete with names, as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., November 1, 1921.

HON. JAMES A. REED,
Senate Finance Committee, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a meeting the following resolution was unanimously indorsed by the undersigned manufacturers and other employers of western Pennsylvania and is respectfully submitted for your consideration:

"Whereas industry is paralyzed and thousands of men are out of employment, and this condition is complicated and accentuated by the uncertainty as to taxation and the complex proposed tax legislation now being considered, and will be made infinitely worse by the exorbitant rate of taxation proposed by the Senate; and

"Whereas the administration is pledged to relieve industry of the inequitable and unjust burdens of taxation now in effect; and

"Whereas capital is seeking investment in tax-free securities, making it difficult to secure new capital for industrial developments on account of the proposed inequitable, unjust, and discriminating rate of surtax of 50 per cent: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we, the undersigned manufacturers of western Pennsylvania, register our protest against the surtax of 50 per cent and urge that the rate should be reduced to not exceed 25 per cent, as recommended by the Hon. Secretary Mr. Mellon, and that the corporate income tax should not exceed 10 per cent, as originally provided in the House bill."

Yours, very truly,

Ewart Co., Oil Well Supply Co., Taylor Wilson Manufacturing Co., Nicola Bros. Co., Pittsburgh Clay Products Co., Seven Baker Bros., Walkers' Mills Stone & Brick Co., Wilson-Beegle Coal Co., Marshall Bros. Co.

Now observe the things these gentlemen recommend, namely, a surtax of not to exceed 25 per cent, no matter how high the profits may go, and a tax of not to exceed 10 per cent upon corporations, no matter what their profits may be, which are the identical things Mr. Mellon recommended.

Now I turn to the list of signers, probably 200 in number, and I find among them the Gulf Oil Corporation, one of Mr. Mellon's own corporations, backing up Mr. Mellon's own theory. I find another, the Mellon National Bank, another one of Mr. Mellon's own corporations, backing up Mr. Mellon's activities in his official capacity and pleading with its own master to do the very thing its own master proposes to do.

I find also the Pittsburgh Coal Co. is one of the signers, that being one of Mr. Mellon's companies. I find the Union Trust Co. of Pittsburgh, likewise a signer, that being one of his numerous companies.

So that it appears that there is harmony between the interests of Mellon and Mr. Mellon's official actions which indicates a community of spirit, and that at least Mr. Mellon officially thinks in the same terms in which these great financial and industrial interests think.

Mr. President, let me now call attention to some of Mr. Mellon's financial business interests:

The Aluminum Co. of America, capitalization $20,000,000, controlling five companies with a combined capital of $20,000,000. I understand that is the Aluminum Trust, and that it is a complete monopoly.

The American Locomotive Co., capital $50,000,000.

The American Metal Co., a holding company, $25,000,000 capital, which controls 12 companies with combined capitalization of $8,000,000.

The Baltimore Car & Foundry Co., $1,500,000.

The Carborundum Co., $2,500,000.

The Gulf Oil Corporation, $60,000,000, which controls nine companies with a combined capitalization of $24,000,000.

This makes a total capitalization of $210,000,000.

Banks and trust companies, $33,500,000. Total capitalization, $243,500,000.

National Bank of Commerce of New York, capitalization $25,000,000, surplus $25,000,000, deposits $363,000,000. Mellon National Bank, capitalization $6,000,000, surplus $5,000,000, deposits $102,000,000. Union Savings Bank, capitalization $1,000,000, surplus, $1,000,000, deposits $20,000,000. Union Trust Co., capitalization $1,500,000, surplus $35,000,000, deposits $100,000,000.

Pennsylvania Railroad Co., of which prior to January, 1921, he was a director, with a total capital of $440,000,000. Grand total capitalization, $683,500,000.

Mr. President, in view of the fact that the Morgan banks and other great banks of New York were the financial agents of foreign Governments during the World War and hold or have negotiated their securities to the amount of billions of dollars; in view of the intimate close relationship of Mr. Mellon to these great banks and trust companies; in view of the desire of the Morgan banks and their allies to cancel our foreign loans and the propaganda they have carried on in this country, I say that the last man in the United States upon whom unlimited authority to settle these loans should be granted is Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury—the last man but one, and that is Mr. Morgan himself.

Mr. President, I do not like to say those things. Personally Mr. Mellon is a most agreeable gentleman. I have no doubt as he sees the light he is a patriotic gentleman. I have no doubt that he tries to think he is acting outside of the influences to which I have referred. But I have no more doubt there is an inside to this proposed settlement with foreign countries than I have that Senators on the other side of the Chamber by their votes passed the Newberry resolution the other day. I insist that the Congress, before it grants an iota of power, shall write into the bill the boundaries and limits of authority, so that the people of the United States will secure that which is justly due to them.

It is no palliation of the situation which I am discussing to say that the bill has been changed and that the authority heretofore proposed to be conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury is now to be conferred upon a commission. What guaranty is that? The Secretary of the Treasury is to be the chairman of the commission. The commission may be composed entirely of members of the Cabinet; it may be composed of others; but the Secretary will dominate it just as he dominated the majority of the Finance Committee, every man of whom, as I recall, protested against granting this power, and, if I understood, had agreed to a limitation such as is embraced in the very amendment now under consideration. Yet Mr. Mellon was powerful enough to persuade them to report the bill with that wholesome provision omitted. Mr. Mellon will be the commission; what he desires, the commission will do.

The appointment of commissions is no guaranty. We had a commission when we undertook to settle certain matters connected with the sale of foreign property. I read in the New York American that there was a sale of the Bosch Magneto Co. It is there baldly charged that it was sold to a man who was twice a convict; that it was sold for about half its value. Gov. Edwards, of New Jersey, it is stated, has identified the portrait of this man Kern as a forger and confidence man who has served his terms in prison. This was done notwithstanding the existence of a commission. Then the picture of the convict is displayed. It is further stated that the sale was approved by Francis P. Garvan, who was the director of the Bureau of Investigation of the Alien Property Custodian's office. I do not know what the facts may be, but I ought to say here that the newspaper contains a statement in effect that Mr. Garvan denies the charges. The point I make, however, is that the existence of commissions is no guaranty.

What is the point of this whole matter? The Secretary of the Treasury insists that he shall have authority to fix the times of the payment of interest. He objects to a clause that the interest shall be payable annually or semiannually; that is to say, he insists he shall have the right at will to postpone the date of the payment of interest to such time as he sees fit. In its broadest and worst sense, that is practically equivalent to wiping out the principal, for if the interest payments were indefinitely postponed or forgiven for a period of about 12 years the interest would equal the principal itself. I have not figured it, but that is my rough estimate.

What is the excuse offered by the apologists for this bill? We are told that there are certain countries now able to pay their interest, and that there are certain other countries which are not able to pay their interest, and that, therefore, we must give the power to the Secretary of the Treasury to stipulate for the payment of the interest at such time as he may see fit. Is the argument sound? Does the conclusion follow?

Let us assume that when the Secretary of the Treasury comes to make the settlement he settles with Great Britain, a country that is able to pay its interest, and writes in that the interest shall be payable six months from this date; that he approaches France and all of the other debtor countries, insisting that the day has now come to put into proper form the obligations which they solemnly agreed to give to us at the time they obtained the money. Suppose some of those countries say, "But we will not be in shape to meet our first interest payment six months from now." Well and good; they can at least sign the obligation they agreed to sign when they got this money three years ago, and when the six months comes around if they can not at that time meet their interest, it will then be for the United States to say whether it will formally grant an extension or whether it will simply allow the interest to remain in default, insisting that the country shall pay as soon as possible.

The Secretary of the Treasury offers the excuse that it will not be a good thing to have the interest on these bonds defaulted; that somehow or other a terrible consequence will follow upon the making of an obligation and the failure to pay the interest which is stipulated in the obligation. Is a nation, indeed, in any worse condition under those circumstances than it is if it says in advance, "We can not pay the interest, and you must postpone it for 2, 3, 4, 5, or even 10 years"? The failure to pay the interest when stipulated in the bond might be an act of bankruptcy on the part of an individual, but the statement in advance that the country can not pay the interest as it becomes due is an admission of bankruptcy in advance, and one is no worse than is the other.

While I am discussing the question of how far the Secretary of the Treasury has drifted from the idea of ultimately allowing these countries to escape the payment of their debts, may I be permitted to call attention to an examination of the Secretary of the Treasury before the Finance Committee? I asked him a question and read him a letter, an excerpt from which I will present:

Senator REED. I understand you to say, Mr. Secretary, that there has been no general plan discussed for the handling of this business which is referred to in the bill. Now, I want to read you a statement here and see whether there is any truth in it or not. I am reading from a newspaper clipping of June 17. It is an article by Robert B. Armstrong.

That article, among other statements, contains the following:

The legislation asked will permit the Secretary of the Treasury to guarantee the principal and interest if, in his judgment, such course is desirable.

That is to say, to take the bonds of the debtor countries and then put the indorsement and guaranty of the United States of America back of them. That has a tremendous significance in what follows:

All of the loans now due the United States carry with them a lot of overdue and accrued interest which, under the plan contemplated, will be included in the bond issue proposed to represent these loans.

The tentative plan contemplates that all of the accrued and overdue interest is to be either included in the amount of the bond issue to be pledged by the Governments which owe the large sums to the United States or that this interest be extinguished by increasing the rate on the long-time securities enough to absorb all the back interest and at the same time make the securities bear a higher rate of interest and become, therefore, desirable for the investors of the United States.

If this is done, it is probable that the United States will not guarantee the bonds, but sell them on the interest rate and the security of the Government issuing them.

In other words, in part, the proposition there contained was that, whereas there was a billion dollars of interest already accumulated upon this indebtedness, we should not take bonds for that billion dollars but that we should take bonds only for the $10,000,000,000 of principal; then we would charge a higher rate of interest on the $10,000,000,000, and in that way ultimately recoup ourselves for the $1,000,000,000 of already defaulted interest. That was the plan. That was the device. That was one of the schemes, at least, they had in contemplation, according to this writer. Now, let us see what happened. Following the reading of the article I addressed a question to the Secretary of the Treasury, as follows:

Senator REED. I have read you the whole article, and I want to ask you if there is any truth in that statement?

Secretary MELLON. There was nothing so far as concerns any suggestion or anything originating with any foreign Government. There has nothing of that sort been suggested. There have been a great many suggestions generally by the press and by people of different methods of treating the indebtedness and of taking care of this accumulated interest, etc. There was a suggestion made and that was one which the President thought was a good one. It has not any significance so far as any particular Government is concerned or so far as this refunding is concerned, excepting that it seemed a good business proposition. That suggestion was this: Here we had certain accumulated interest that it may be necessary or desirable to extend or defer the payment of. The thought there was this, that if, instead of adding that interest to the principal it was added to the rate of interest during the whole life of the bonds to be accepted, the refunding bonds, it would give those bonds a larger rate of interest than they otherwise would have. For instance, if we were going to accept refunding bonds at 5 per cent that we add this accumulating interest into an additional rate of interest and say, for example, that that made that rate of interest 6 per cent. That, then, would make the bonds more marketable. They would be bearing a higher rate of interest, and the benefit would come in the future from the fact that they bore a higher rate of interest and would be more marketable than they might be if they were at a lower rate of interest. That was merely an incidental suggestion.

Senator REED. You say you think that would be good business?

Secretary MELLON. It should be considered.

Senator REED. Let us put that in plain language. European Governments owe the United States in principal $10,000,000,000 and in interest $1,000,000,000. The proposition is to have them issue their bonds not for $11,000,000,000, bearing a rate of interest, but to have them issue their bonds for $10,000,000,000, bearing a higher rate of interest, the $1,000,000,000 to be devoted to the raising or increasing of that higher rate of interest. Thereupon these bonds will be sold to investors. In that event Uncle Sam loses the $1,000,000,000 of interest, does he not, that has already accumulated?

Secretary MELLON. If he does not sell the bonds, he gets the same money that otherwise would be gotten. Now, the matter of selling the bonds is a matter of judgment of Congress when the time comes.

Senator REED. But it will not be a matter of judgment of Congress under this bill; it will be a matter of judgment of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Then the Secretary said the bill did not contain the authority, but it was shown he was mistaken.

Mr. President, that throws a little light on this question. It is all in harmony with the primary purpose of foreign Governments to have these loans canceled, or, if not canceled, then at least to have them postponed. It is completely in accord with the scheme of the bankers who hold these private investments in European bonds to have the debt of the United States Government postponed that they may collect their private debts.

Mr. President, it is a quarter of 5 o'clock, and there are very few Senators in the Chamber. I desire to spend a little while further in discussing this matter; and I ask the chairman of the committee, in charge of the bill, if he is not willing to move a recess at this time?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I did not know but that we could go on perhaps until half past 5; but if no other Senator wants to speak upon the subject——

Mr. REED. I desire to conclude my remarks in the morning, and not to-night. I shall not take much time in the morning—probably 10 or 15 minutes—but I do not want to conclude to-night. There is a very small attendance here at this hour. Almost everyone has gone home, and I should like to go with the rest of them myself.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from North Dakota if he does not think that we might make an agreement to vote upon this bill to-morrow? I myself am very anxious that we shall vote on it to-morrow, if possible, for a personal reason which I have no hesitation in stating. I desire very much to be here when the vote is taken, and it is impossible for me to be here on Monday or Tuesday.

Mr. REED. How about Wednesday?

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing to agree to a vote on Wednesday.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we have so very much work before us that I hope we shall get through with the bill at least some time to-morrow. I stated a short time ago that with the heavy work that is pressing in other matters in which especially the members of the Finance Committee are engaged, I should ask for a night session to-morrow evening if we did not complete the bill earlier. I had hoped to get through with it to-day. I understood that the Senator from Missouri intended to take about 20 minutes, and his 20 minutes have been somewhat extended. Now the Senator says that he wants 15 minutes in the morning. If I were to measure the 15 minutes by the same rate by which I measure the 20 minutes to-day, I am afraid the Senator's remarks to-morrow will take considerably more than 15 minutes; but I do not wish to cut off any Senator who wants to cover the subject fully, though I want to get through as quickly as possible.

Mr. REED. The Senator, as well as myself, is a very poor estimator of time when he takes the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Sometimes.

Mr. REED. I want to offer a few remarks about this bill to-morrow morning. I do not want to do it to-night. It is late. I am perfectly willing to agree, as far as I am concerned, that we shall vote on the bill at some time to-morrow.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would probably be a little difficult to secure a quorum to-night. I suggest, therefore, that we have an executive session, and then take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock. Then we can undoubtedly get a roll call and agree upon some time to-morrow for a vote.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, January 28, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

NOMINATIONS.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 27, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed heavenly Father, incline our hearts toward Thee that we may survive in Thy memory when the day is over. Help us to understand the way of our conduct in the growing light of knowledge and experience, then shall we be stimulated to new and better endeavor. O Spirit Divine, come to us, that the strength of our natures may be cleansed and purified and chafed into new vision and vigor. Send us forth on our errands with wholesome speech, with sweetness of spirit, with clearness of mind, and always in honor and in defense of the right. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

On January 25, 1922:

H. R. 7601. An act to amend an act incorporating Prospect Hill Cemetery, and for other purposes.

On January 26, 1922:

H. R. 1318. An act granting to certain claimants the preferential right to purchase certain alleged public lands in the State of Arkansas, and for other purposes;

H. R. 1459. An act for the relief of Charles R. Powell;

H. R. 1460. An act for the relief of the William Gordon Corporation;

H. R. 2865. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent to J. D. Calhoun, of Lincoln Parish, La., certain lands;

H. R. 4598. An act to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii;

H. R. 6262. An act to add certain lands to Mount McKinley National Park, Alaska;

H. R. 7290. An act to confirm private land claim of the widow and heirs of Joseph Etier;

H. R. 7600. An act authorizing the adjustment of the boundaries of the Deschutes National Forest, in the State of Oregon, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 9050. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Pamunkey Ferry Co. to construct a bridge across the Pamunkey River in Virginia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MUDD was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on request of Mr. ZIHLMAN.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL ADVISORY COMMITTEE FOR AERONAUTICS.

For scientific research, technical investigations, and special reports in the field of aeronautics, including the necessary laboratory and technical assistants; traveling expenses of members and employees; office supplies, printing, and other miscellaneous expenses, including technical periodicals and books of reference; equipment, maintenance, and operation of a research laboratory, known as the Langley Memorial Aeronautical Laboratory; maintenance and operation of one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle; personal services in the field and in the District of Columbia; in all, $200,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation for clerical, drafting, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, shall not exceed $42,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When the bill was up for consideration on a previous day and the item or appropriation for the General Accounting Office was under consideration, I offered an amendment which sought to place the employees of that office on a statutory basis, which was adopted by the committee. That amendment took care of something over 1,500 employees. I was under the impression at the time that the amendment simply took care of those employees for whom the comptroller general had asked and which had been recommended by the committee, but I have been informed by the clerk of the committee that by oversight the amendment included a law clerk at $2,750, which was not asked for by the comptroller general and which was not recommended by the committee. I ask unanimous consent to return to that item, in order that I may ask unanimous consent that the law clerk at $2,750 be stricken from the amendment which was adopted. It is on page 11 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to page 11 under the title, "General Accounting Office," for the purpose of correcting an oversight. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment to which I have referred be corrected by striking out one law clerk at $2,750.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the provision for the employment and payment of a law clerk at $2,750 be eliminated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

American ethnology: For continuing ethnological researches among the American Indians and the natives of Hawaii, including the excavation and preservation of archæologic remains under the direction of the Smithsonian Institution, including necessary employees and the purchase of necessary books and periodicals, $44,000.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order for just a few minutes. I rarely take the time of the committee, so I think I may be excused in this instance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to proceed out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, announcement was made yesterday by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, through the press, in committee, and also in conference last night, that a sales tax would probably be enacted in order to support a soldiers' bonus bill, calculated by him to reach $1,600,000,000. The cost to consumers, of course, will be several times the amount of the tax, and it will mean, if made law, that a new burden of between four and five billion dollars will be laid on the American people for that purpose. I have been strongly in favor of a soldiers' bonus from the start. I believe it is justified, but there is no excuse, in my judgment, for placing this tax burden upon the people in order to finance the bill. I am not going to discuss the merits of the sales-tax proposition at this time, but this seems the only place where we have a chance to be heard, as conferences do not afford opportunity. On January 3 I placed in the RECORD a statement of what was about to happen and predicted a sales tax would be urged to finance the compensation bill. There I suggested other methods of payment and discussed the sales tax and furnished a score of opinions of tax experts, men who represent the American Federation of Labor, men who represent the four brotherhoods of the railroad associations. They all unqualifiedly condemn the sales tax. Many agricultural organizations and high tax experts, like Andrews, Zoller, and Dr. Seligman, all are opposed to any consumption tax. Beyond that I placed in the RECORD of January 3 a statement of the Canadian situation, where a "manufacturers'" sales tax is in force, with its condemnation by the labor organizations of Canada and leading farm organizations, and the statement that, due to the high prices, there has been a transfer of control from the Conservative Party over to the Liberals and the Progressives in Parliament of about 3 to 1, due to the placing of a sales tax on the people, to the excessive high tariff rates, and to the repeal of the excess-profits taxes in Canada. That is practically the situation in this country. We have enacted a protective tariff bill, repealed the excess-profits tax and high surtaxes, and now propose to pass an indefensible sales tax.

We were told from the Clerk's desk of this House recently by the President of this country that there would be no shifting of taxes, there was to be a lifting of taxes all along the line. We have since then repealed the excess-profits taxes, which brought in $450,000,000 annually. We have reduced the surtaxes by $61,000,000 a year, and we have repealed the luxury taxes, all taxes on profits and wealth, and the proposition now is to place a consumption tax upon the people, which is a direct shifting of the taxes from those best able to pay to those least able to pay. I do not know whether you gentlemen realize what that is going to mean socially, economically, and politically. A Republican Member from New York said to me to-day, "We have lost our State, I fear," and I said, "If you have a consumption tax placed upon the people of the country of between three and four billions of dollars, or more, as proposed, you may lose the whole country, just as the Conservatives lost the election in Canada and turned a strong majority into a hopeless minority of 65 compared to 177 votes of the victorious Progressive and Liberal Parties.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, we are trying to get through with this bill. This is a discussion of a matter entirely outside of the bill.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I realize that, but I want only five minutes more. It is a matter of vital importance to the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. I want to impress upon gentlemen that this sales tax proposed probably will come before us under a rule. You will be asked to vote for a rule that will stifle you and gag you from proposing amendments, as in the case of a revenue bill. You swallowed it then; you were compelled to under a "rule."

The revenue bill went to the Senate, where they gave two months to it. There they put on 800 amendments, and the only amendment the House had any chance to vote upon was when the bill came back to conference. You had to fight hard here on the floor in order to obtain a chance to vote on one amendment. That same situation will probably come with the sales tax fastened onto the soldiers' bill that is now in the hands of the Ways and Means Committee. I know the complexion of the committee; they are high-class men, but they were in favor of a sales tax and so reported when the soldiers' bill was up before us last session. Although we were given little chance to oppose the sales tax then in a Republican conference, the proposal was stricken from the bill. I believe we may know what the committee will do again. I do not object to anyone differing from me. I do not object to any fair-minded man voting or acting as he chooses on any subject. That is his right, but we want the same right, and that right is cut off by any rule that prevents amendments to the bill. Give us a chance to be heard. When that rule comes before this House, as it will come if we were advised correctly last night, remember that if you vote for it you will stifle your own right to amend if a sales tax is hooked up with the bill. On a fair discussion and fair vote, a sales tax will be defeated in the House 2 to 1, so do not vote to tie your hands, as you did on the revenue bill. If any sales tax is reported, let it stand on its own merits, and it will never be used to finance the soldiers' bonus bill. It can not be passed by Congress unless put in that bill either openly or by some parliamentary strategem like the revenue bill experience.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Does the gentleman think we are going to bring up the sales tax here under a rule?

Mr. FREAR. That is the suggestion made by the chairman of the committee, who does not speak my views or that of a majority of this House, in my opinion.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I am surprised at that.

Mr. FREAR. I will say to my friends on the Democratic side who are surprised and are a unit against the sales tax, that I understand also they are a unit for the soldiers' bonus bill. Now it is for the House, without reference to partisanship, to decide whether we will accept this unjust financing proposition that is going to load a heavy consumption tax burden upon the people. There are many other ways of raising necessary funds, as you will find if you will examine the RECORD of January 3, and look over the 16 pages I there devote to the subject and particularly against the sales tax.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks leave to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FREAR. Among plans to finance the soldiers' compensation bill, it is well to ascertain its prospective cost. In Senate Report No. 133, Sixty-seventh Congress, June 20, 1921, it is stated, page 56:

> Under what we believe will be the real operation of the legislation, the total cost will be, in round numbers, about $4,396,000,000, scattered over a period of 20 years, and that the greatest amount due in any one year prior to 1943 will not exceed $200,000,000.

That total amount covers interest and insurance, and if discounted to-day would be less than one-half, or about $1,600,000,000, and about $200,000,000 yearly.

We are going to have a soldiers' bill and the Greeks bearing gifts of a sales tax are generally—not always—men who have persistently opposed any bonus bill and who finally declare that they will agree to it only if the soldiers are compelled to contribute, through a consumption tax, to their own fund. Why should we lay a sales-tax burden several times the exact tax onto the American people when they are struggling to make ends meet and are hopelessly discouraged in many, many cases? Why should we hand the soldiers and their families a gold-brick sales tax on everything they eat, drink, and wear?

In recent hearings before our committee men like Seligman and Leffingwell, known throughout the world as sane, level-headed business men, have protested against any consumption tax. I quote:

(Hearing, Jan. 19, 1922, p. 35. Dr. E. R. A. Seligman.)

> Mr. GARNER. We have been told by some one of very high standing that from an economic standpoint we could levy a 2 per cent consumption or sales tax in this country and get all the money that is needed to run the Government.
> Mr. SELIGMAN. It is true, I assume, that the general principles governing democratic taxation in this country would continue and that no democratic country would intend to pass or for a moment consider a tax on consumption, because it is only in time of war that there is any need for the restriction of consumption, whereas in time of peace you want to increase consumption that you can increase production and industry and prosperity.

(Hearing, Jan. 19, 1922, p. 22. R. C. Leffingwell.)

> Mr. LEFFINGWELL. The economic and social objection to a sales tax or to any indirect tax is that it hits the man who has to consume the things that his income will buy, because his income is so small and his family so big—out of all proportion to his income—so that the tax is much heavier on him than it is on the man who has a great big income and has to spend a very negligible proportion to meet his tax.
> I believe that the sound principles of taxation are going to come to be recognized by all parties, because they go to the root of social content, and whether we are Republicans or Democrats, and whatever our school of economics and whatever our historical thought about questions like the tariff, whatever our instincts about a sales tax, it is coming down to this, that you can not afford to put the inordinate burdens of the modern State upon the shoulders of the consumer, who has to spend all of his income to keep alive.

(Hearing, Jan. 20, 1922, p. 35. Benjamin Marsh, Farmers National Council.)

> Mr. MARSH. Gentlemen, I wish some of you had taken the trips which I have and talked with these farmers and workers—some workers who have been out of a job for six or eight months and every last dollar gone, and the farmers, who are broke, absolutely—and when you talk about a sales tax—I want to tell you that the sales tax is the dead line politically for any party, and deservedly so.
> Mr. FREAR. Mr. Leffingwell agreed in his opposition to a sales tax and so did Dr. Seligman when they were before our committee.
> Mr. MARSH. And so do something like 20,000,000 voters. They would be interested vitally.

I have quoted many men in Canada who represent the consumers of that country and who recently turned the high taxing Parliament out of office. I quote several letters received recently that are self-explanatory:

NATIONAL BOARD OF FARM ORGANIZATIONS,
Washington, D. C., January 24, 1922.

Congressman JAMES A. FREAR,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FREAR: I have gotten in touch with Canadian people in regard to the sales tax, and I hope to have a definite reply soon.

In the January 14 issue of the Prairie Farmer, published in Chicago, a copy of a letter from N. P. Lambert, secretary of the Canadian Council of Agriculture, appears as follows:

"Our organization throughout the whole country is strongly opposed to the sales tax. The principle of this tax is wrong, in our opinion, being based on the consuming capacity of the great masses rather than their ability to pay. The sales tax was in vogue in the Middle Ages, in such countries as Spain, but to-day I believe the only countries that have used it to any extent are Mexico, Germany, Philippine Islands, and, I think, France. It is generally regarded as a confession on the part of any country that adopts it that all other sources of revenues have been exhausted."

This appears to throw an entirely different light on the matter as far as the Canadian farmers are concerned, and is also in line with my previous understanding of the real position taken by the farmers in that country.

Sincerely, yours,

CHAS. A. LYMAN, Secretary.

UNITED FARMERS OF ALBERTA,
Calgary, Alberta, December 31, 1921.

B. C. MARSH, Esq.,
Farmers National Council, Bliss Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: President Wood has referred to me your letter of December 16 re sales tax. I may say that there is a very strong feeling among the farmers against the sales tax, and that it was vigorously attacked by many of the speakers of the organized farmers during the recent federal general election.

The inclosed pamphlet entitled "Sales tax hits the poor man," is, I think, a summary of the arguments used against this tax during the campaign, while the pamphlet "Try outs in taxation" also contains references to this matter.

I am also inclosing a pamphlet entitled "Tariff or sales tax," which was published in the Grain Growers' Guide some time ago. In this the writer condemns both the tariff and the sales tax, but describes the sales tax as the lesser of the two evils. There has not been very much discussion of the question, however, from this point of view.

I was interested to note that the sales tax in the United States is advocated chiefly by big business and financial interests which fear the heavy income, excess profits, and estate taxes. Exactly the same groups of interests advocated the tax in Canada, and as you will note from the pamphlet "Sales tax hits the poor man," the representatives of the agricultural interests in this country were not consulted in any way in connection with the matter.

Trusting this information may be of some use to you,

Yours, very truly,

UNITED FARMERS OF ALBERTA.

Educational Department.

AN EXAMINATION OF THE PRINCIPAL FEATURE OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT'S BUDGET FOR 1921–22.

(Issued by the Canadian Council of Agriculture.)

The sales tax was the principal feature of the federal budget for the fiscal year 1921–22, which was presented by the minister of finance, Sir Henry Drayton, before Parliament in May. By means of this tax the Federal Government expects to raise the additional revenue which is required to meet the increased expenditures of the present year, as compared with the revenue and expenditures of last year. It involves additional costs of living to every man, woman, and child in Canada, and treats them all alike, whether they be rich or poor, able to pay or not able to pay.

Therefore the sales tax, which was first introduced in Canada during May, 1920, is one that merits close study. This is especially true, because it is intended to fall upon the great mass of the people, being levied, in so far as Canada is concerned, on a large number of the necessaries of life. It is thus primarily a consumption tax, which is another good reason why it should be thoroughly studied; for it is levied not in proportion to one's ability to pay but in proportion as one consumes. As first introduced, it was a tax of 1 per cent on sales by the manufacturer or producer to the wholesaler or jobber, who in turn collected from the retailer. On sales made direct by the manufacturer or producer to the retailer the rate was 2 per cent. In 1921 the rate was increased to 1½ per cent on sales by the manufacturer or producer to the wholesaler or jobber; when the sale is made direct to the retailer the rate is 3 per cent. Another tax of 1 per cent is also collected on imports, the rate on such sales to the consumer being not less than 4 per cent.

Taxes approximating to the sales tax were collected in Europe as far back as the Middle Ages, but coming down to the history of the last half century the sales tax made its appearance in Mexico nearly 40 years ago, during the régime of Dictator Porfirio Diaz. The finances of Mexico were then in a chaotic state; taxation being very little understood, was only slightly discussed, and as the Mexican had to buy and sell, Diaz came to the conclusion that by taxing these absolutely necessary operations he could raise revenue, and he did.

The sales tax was next copied by the United States administration in the Philippine Islands. After the Spanish-American War, through which these islands passed to the United States, their business life was in a state of collapse; the Spanish market, on which they had depended largely, having been closed to them. Being desirous of bringing about free trade with the United States, the sales tax was introduced as a means of securing a substitute for the revenue that had chiefly come through customs levied on American imports. France in 1920 adopted the turnover tax, which in principle is similar to the sales tax, though more equitable in that in France it included services and transactions of all kinds, as well as commodities. Germany also has such a tax, which is very far-reaching in its effect.

WHO ASKED FOR IT?

Whatever may be said in favor of the sales tax there is no doubt about it being an attempt to secure new revenue from the great mass of the people who work for a living. There is no pretention that it lightens the load of taxation resting on the masses; on the contrary, it is usually accompanied by measures designed to relieve the well-to-do of taxes borne by them. Canada's experience has demonstrated this in the most striking manner.

By whom has this tax been advocated? By the farmers, by labor, or by the great mass of those of small means? Influential financial, industrial, and commercial interests started the agitation. In March there was held at Toronto a conference on taxation attended by representatives of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Credit Men's Association, the Retail Merchants' Association, and the Canadian Wholesale Grocers' Association. Neither the organized farmers nor labor were invited, though both would have sent representatives had their presence been desired. Note the recommendations made to the minister of finance by this gathering: "That the business-profits tax shall not be reenacted; that the income tax as regards corporations shall be repealed; that the present existing tax on confectionery shall be abolished; that the present sales tax shall be adjusted so as to provide the additional revenue needed by the Dominion Government."

It is true that in 1920, when the sales tax was first introduced, no taxes were abolished or reduced. But in 1921, when the tax was increased, it was made to do the bidding of the interests represented at the Toronto gathering, and no others. Everything asked, save the repeal of the income tax affecting corporations, was granted and the nature of the sales tax was thus revealed in its true light. No attempt was made to secure from the best-off portions of the community any part of the revenue thus lost. The masses were expected to make up what the big business interests were relieved of. Sixty-two millions of new revenue were required, and the heavier sales tax was the only means provided for the raising of the money, which meant a per capita tax of $7 for the year.

SOME ABSURD CLAIMS.

Who are the advocates of the sales tax in the United States? For the most part they are representatives of the big interests, the agents of great capitalists and war profiteers, who, though they did not dare to complain of taxation while the war waged, have maintained a loud clamor against it since peace was proclaimed. These interests have conducted a vigorous propaganda in favor of the sales tax, many of the arguments thus advanced having been reproduced in Canada. Never before had as many absurd claims and extravagant statements been made on behalf of any system of taxation as have been made by the American advocates of the sales tax. They have told the public that a 1 per cent tax would produce so much revenue that no income taxes below $5,000, and possibly $10,000, would be required; that all surtaxes on incomes might be abolished, and that practically all the special war taxes might be allowed to go. So absurd are their statements that they call in question the whole case for the sales tax, so that the general public may well regard it with suspicion. They have been prepared to promise anything in order to get the opportunity to shift the load from their own shoulders.

The sales tax can never be regarded as one of the main sources of revenue in Canada, since to make it so could only be done through a violent disregard of the best recognized principles of taxation, namely, that taxes should be levied in proportion to the individual's ability to pay them. As a source of revenue the 1 per cent tax in Canada was far from being a great success. During the 11 months up to the end of April, 1921, that it was in operation, it brought in only $40,898,383. As a producer of revenue it failed most when money was most needed. In October, 1920, when business was good and retail prices still high the collections were $5,020,476, but in April they fell to $2,873,219, and were still falling when the tax was increased. As Parliament voted $620,000,000 this year one can easily see how far a 1 per cent tax would go to produce that amount. During the 6 months that the luxury taxes were in operation they brought in $2,000,000 more than the sales tax did during the whole 11.

Advocates of the sales tax make much of the fact that it is easily collected, and they confidently assert that nobody feels it. A tax collected on the necessaries of life that all must have, can not fail to bring in a certain amount of money. But the question of the equitable nature of the tax must also be considered. Armies of occupation, through compulsion, sometimes succeed in raising large sums of money from comparatively poor countries; but to say that it can be collected is not sufficient justification for a tax. The sales tax is inequitable if for no other reason than that the poor man, who must spend practically all he earns, pays the tax out of what should go for necessaries, whereas the rich man pays it out of his surplus. The rich man, who spends several months in the year out of the country, escapes the tax; but the man who can not afford to go away, pays.

LET THE CONSUMER BEWARE.

The claim that the consumer did not feel the payment of the 1 per cent tax is open to question. It is absurd to say that an already heavy taxed public does not feel the taking of another $40,000,000 from it, especially when the greater part of it is taken from the poorest paid. Surely no one will contend that the new tax, which on domestic sales is at least 3 per cent by the time it reaches the consumer—and the tax on imported commodities, which is 4 per cent in such case—is not felt. It is difficult to determine definitely by how much the cost of the consumer is increased by the sales tax; but the probability is that the 1921 rate will increase costs generally about 5 per cent. On certain imported goods, on which the tax will never be less than 4 per cent, the cost may be increased as much as 8 per cent. This is especially true of commodities such as rubber tires, into the manufacture of which many imported materials enter. The effect of the tax in increasing the cost of lumber became so apparent that a reduction was made to the effect the tax on sale of domestic material should not exceed 2 per cent; on sales of imported lumber the rate was fixed at 3 per cent. Even at these rates the tax is considerable to the settler who must build a house and outbuildings. It is, moreover, to be observed that the additional 1 per cent on imports will have the effect of raising the home price on all such articles as are taxable. Experience with the tariff leads one to expect this.

The consumer is bound to feel the effects of the 1921 tax more than that of the preceding year for the further reason that the list of tax-free commodities has been much reduced. The following, which were exempt in 1920, are now taxed: Salted, smoked, and canned meats, soups, tea, coffee, condensed coffee, milk foods and similar milk products, sage, tapioca, macaroni, vermicelli, split peas, pea meal, rice, rice flour, cornstarch, potato starch and flour, canned and desiccated fruits and vegetables, maple, corn, and can sirup and imitations thereof. No argument is required to show that the taxing of these articles is a very considerable additional levy on consumers. It is worthy of special note that tea and coffee, being imported articles, bear a tax of at least 4 per cent. This is taxing the poor man's breakfast table, which most Governments are now loth to do.

In the case of many persons enjoying but a small salary or income, the sales tax practically cuts away the exemptions from the income tax. On an income of but $2,000 a year a married man pays no income tax; but calculating the per capita sales tax at $7, then, if he has a family of four, he will pay $28. The head of a family of four—that is, a wife and two children—having a salary of $2,500, pays but $4 in income tax, but his sales tax will now take from him seven times that. And the examples to this effect could be multiplied.

AN INSIDIOUS TAX.

One of the most dangerous features of the sales tax is its insidious character. So-called "painless" extraction methods of taxation are always to be feared, for in a quiet way they touch the average person most effectually. Definite knowledge of what taxes the individual pays is one of the surest safeguards against inequitable taxation. By the "painless" sales tax it is proposed to take this year $23,000,000 more from the consumers of Canada than was taken last year. What is the use of making a fight over the tariff if the money which it is hoped may thereby be saved is to be taken away by another method?

Additional danger lurks in the possibility that having brought about its introduction certain interests that have been benefited may further use it to shift other burdens from their shoulders. It is well known that they are restive under the tax on higher incomes, and also under the surtaxes, and it may be taken for granted that an attempt will be made to shift those on to the backs of the masses. The signs are not wanting that some of the most important political battles of the no distant future will be fought over the question of taxation.

There should be an insistence that taxes conform to the well-known canons of taxation laid down by Adam Smith in the following: "The subjects of every State ought to contribute toward the support of the government, as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue that they respectively enjoy under the protection of the State. The expense of government to the individuals of a great nation is like the expense of management to the joint tenants of a great estate, who are all obliged to contribute in proportion to their respective interests in the estate. In the observance or neglect of this maxim consists what is called the equality or inequality of taxation." According to this standard, the sales tax is weighed in the balance and found wanting.

PEOPLE'S LEGISLATIVE SERVICE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., January 27, 1922.

Hon. JAMES A. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FREAR: I think you may be interested in the inclosed circular letter issued by the heads of the four railway brotherhoods opposing a sales tax and indorsing an increased estate tax as a means of raising revenue to pay the soldiers' bonus.

Yours, very truly,

BASIL M. MANLY, Director.

At the recent farm conference called by President Harding agricultural organizations from every part of the country joined in a resolution denouncing a sales tax.

[Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.]

CLEVELAND, OHIO, January 14, 1922.

To all members of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, Order of Railway Conductors, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen in the United States.

DEAR SIRS AND BROTHERS: The attention of all members is called to the proposed sales tax bill introduced by Congressman VOLK, of New York. It is the intention to raise $2,000,000,000 a year by a sales tax upon everything you consume. In order to have this bill put over and become a law, they have tied it up as a part of the bill for a bonus for soldiers. We think all workingmen agree that the soldiers who fought for their country are entitled to a bonus, and that such a bill should be passed, but, in our opinion, it is not necessary, in order to pay this bonus, that the working people of the United States should be taxed through a direct sales tax bill to the amount of $2,000,000,000.

The sales tax bill can be killed most easily by the enactment of a rapidly progressive tax upon estates, by restoring the excess-profits tax, by retaining heavy taxation of large incomes, by levying a small tax on the value of land in excess of $10,000, with an exemption to all farmers who receive less than $3,000 income per year, as provided in the Keller bill. Senator LA FOLLETTE has introduced such an estates tax bill (S. 2901), and it has been referred to the Senate Committee on Finance.

We ask that you interest yourself enough in this vicious sales tax bill to indorse Senator LA FOLLETTE'S estate tax bill, and to send him copies of such resolution to be read on the floor of the Senate and printed in the RECORD. This means much to you in your cost of living, and if the sales tax bill should become a law it means that the working people of this country must contribute from their wages $2,000,000,000 a year. In our opinion, the only way this can be killed is by the enactment of such legislation as has been introduced by Senator LA FOLLETTE, by restoring the excess-profits tax, retaining the progressive tax upon large incomes, and levying a small tax upon land values, as provided in the Keller bill.

It is not a question of politics; it is a question of self-preservation; and every division and every lodge of these organizations should take interest enough in their own welfare to pass such resolution and forward same to Senator LA FOLLETTE.

Hoping you will give this your prompt consideration, we remain,

Yours, fraternally,

W. S. STONE,
Grand Chief Engineer Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.
W. S. CARTER,
President Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen.
L. E. SHEPPARD,
President Order of Railway Conductors.
W. G. LEE,
President Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen.

In conclusion let me say that I have offered the testimony of a score of reputable witnesses in the RECORD of January 3, and I will present additional witnesses to the committee against any sales tax if offered opportunity.

A consumption tax would be political suicide to any proposal if separated from a soldiers' bill. It ought to be rejected in any event, and short-time securities, not exceeding three years, could be issued with the understanding they were to be cared for and protected by the British $4,500,000,000 foreign-loan interest as it comes due. The following are among many other suggestions heretofore offered for consideration, any of which are preferable to a sales tax, that is unjust from any point of view.

The following is offered as a conservative estimate of what the 1921 tax bill might reasonably have brought to the Treasury but for the constant blocking of legislation by the cry it "soaked the rich and oppressed business." Here are the items:

First. Excess-profits tax	$450,000,000
Second. Replace surtaxes on income	61,500,000
Third. Luxury taxes	60,000,000
Fourth. Inheritance taxes	200,000,000
Fifth. Gift taxes	200,000,000
Sixth. Undistributed profits proposals rejected	500,000,000
	1,471,500,000
Corporation normal tax credit added of 2½ per cent	111,000,000
	1,360,500,000

To these items may be added over $250,000,000 annually in interest payments on foreign loans that could be used to finance a soldiers' bill.

[NOTE.—Many tax experts, labor and farm organizations, including Canadian organizations, denounce the consumption tax in statements found in the RECORD of Jan. 3 and Jan. 27.]

These items can be embodied into law to-day if necessary.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

There was some discussion the other day about the lawyers that are employed in this bill, and if I gather the information correctly from these hearings the main authority for these employees is the testimony of Mr. Schlesinger.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, we have not reached that item yet. Let us wait until we get to it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman objects, I will have to wait, of course.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will have to object. Let us get along in order here. We can proceed much faster in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, lights, repairs, ground rent, miscellaneous items, printing, and city directory, $22,300.

Mr. WATSON. I want to ask the gentlemen in charge of the bill what activity occupies the temporary building at 18 Virginia Avenue and how long you intend to maintain it?

Mr. WASON. That is the language that has been carried in the bill heretofore. We hire the land, as I understand.

Mr. WATSON. It is not owned by the Government but rented, and for what purpose?

Mr. WASON. The building was erected during the war and was used for housing some of the Government activities at that time, and now it is being used by this department.

Mr. WATSON. Will this building be abandoned at an early date, or is it likely to be occupied for Government purposes year after year?

Mr. WASON. The building is on leased ground. Consequently it is of a temporary character.

Mr. WATSON. The Government constructed the building?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. It is one of these papier-mâché buildings?

Mr. WASON. Yes; about that type.

Mr. WATSON. You do not know how long it will be occupied?

Mr. WASON. No.

Mr. WATSON. Thirty-eight thousand six hundred and fifty dollars for salaries. Can the gentleman tell us what activities are conducted there?

Mr. WASON. The War Trade Board is in one of them, and they are occupied by various Government activities, and this is for the upkeep and maintenance of the quarters used, the Government owning the building and, of course, paying the rental for the ground. In time, I expect it will be cleared away.

Mr. WATSON. There are many temporary structures; I hope they will be soon abandoned.

Mr. WASON. I will say to the gentleman that we have already begun removing some of these temporary buildings that were erected down on B and Sixth Streets, and the policy will be pursued along that line.

Mr. WATSON. Would it be an economical feature if the Government abandoned all temporary buildings and maintained offices in permanent ones?

Mr. WASON. No. I will say to my colleague that they are very serviceable buildings of their kind. They can be used comfortably, and our expense is ground rent, upkeep of the buildings, heating, lighting, and janitor service, and such, much cheaper than it would be to go out and hire quarters from private ownership or to buy them or to build at this time.

Mr. WATSON. Will necessity require permanent buildings be erected on lots where temporary offices are not located?

Mr. WASON. Not on this lot, because it is leased. But that is a proposition that lies too far ahead.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TEMPORARY BUILDINGS.

Salaries: For employees for the maintenance and protection of the temporary office buildings known as follows: War Trade Building, between B and C Streets and Twentieth and Twenty-first Streets NW.; Food Administration Building No. 1, between Eighteenth and Nineteenth Streets and C and D Streets NW.; Food Administration Building No. 2, between New York Avenue and D Street and Nineteenth and Twentieth Streets NW.; Fuel Administration Buildings Nos. 1 and 2, bounded by Virginia Avenue, Eighteenth and C Streets NW.; Fuel Administration Building No. 3, on D Street, between Twentieth and Twenty-first Streets NW.; H. L. Pettus Building, on Nineteenth Street, between Virginia Avenue and D Street NW.; and Archie Butt Building, 1725 New York Avenue NW.: Assistant superintendent, $2,000; principal clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 3, 1 of class 2, 3 of class 1; 2 messengers, at $840 each; electricians—1, $1,400; 2 at $1,200 each; foreman carpenter, $1,600; carpenter—1, $1,400, three at $1,200 each; plumbers, 1, $1,400, 2 at $1,200 each; steam fitter, $1,400; painters—3 at $1,200 each; 6 general mechanics at $1,000 each; assistant engineers—1, $1,400, 3 at $1,200 each; 13 firemen, at $840 each; 6 coal passers, at $720 each; guards—captain $1,600, 3 lieutenants at $1,080 each, 8 sergeants at $900 each, 80 privates at $780 each; fire marshal, $1,200; foreman of laborers, $1,000; 2 assistant foremen of laborers, at $840 each; 6 foremen or forewomen, at $720 each; 26 laborers, at $660 each; 5 female laborers, at $480 each; laborers and charwomen, $43,560; in all, $203,480.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I desire very briefly to call attention to a statement appearing on page 1867 of the RECORD in connection with the consideration of this bill, wherein a little piece of legislation was slipped into the bill for printing and binding for the Interstate Commerce Commission, carrying a certain authority to do certain printing, not to exceed $1,500, at offices outside of the Government Printing Office. Of course, there is a reason and a necessity for doing that work, but to do that very thing is one of the authorities that are given to the Joint Committee on Printing. I am indicating this to the Appropriations Committee so that if they desire to keep legislation out of these appropriation bills they need not add that kind of legislation for printing.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For seven commissioners, at $12,000 each; secretary, $5,000; in all, $89,000.

For all other expenditures authorized by the act approved September 7, 1916, as amended, including the compensation of attorneys, officers, naval architects, special experts, examiners, clerks, and other employees in the District of Columbia and elsewhere; and for all other expenses of the board, including the rental of quarters outside the District of Columbia, law books, books of reference, and periodicals, printing and binding, and actual and necessary expenses of members of the board, its special experts, and other employees, or per diem in lieu of subsistence when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, while upon official business outside of the District of Columbia, $350,000.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DALLINGER: Page 27, line 19, after the figures "$350,000," insert the following new paragraph:

"No part of the moneys appropriated in each or any section of this act, or which is now available for the use of any independent executive bureau, board, or commission under existing law, shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing which, at the time of the proposed purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning, can be manufactured, produced, repaired, or reconditioned in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased, acquired, repaired, or reconditioned otherwise."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order on the amendment. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes; I wish to call the attention of the House to the ruling made by Judge Saunders, of Virginia, in 1919, which appears on page 3731 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-fifth Congress, third session. The wording of my amendment follows the wording of the amendment there considered, with only one substantial change.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I thought when the amendment was read that it was not only a limitation upon the appropriation made in this bill but also a limitation upon the expenditure of money already available, heretofore appropriated. Is that correct?

Mr. DALLINGER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman contend that you can put a limitation in this bill affecting moneys appropriated in some other way?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that it seems to me there ought to be an extension of the Holman rule, because I think that such a remedy as this is necessary in a case of this kind in order to save money to the Treasury of the United States. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that the reason why I have offered this amendment in this form is that some of us were informed a short time ago that the Shipping Board did not consider that it had money enough under its old appropriation to recondition the Leviathan and other vessels, and that they would have to wait for the action of Congress. Now, since the discussion of this question under general debate, and since it has been known that an amendment of this character would be offered here, providing that if any of these vessels could be conditioned cheaper in a Government yard than they can be reconditioned by private contractors, the rumor has gone abroad that the Shipping Board are planning in some way, by taking money that perhaps they intended for other purposes, to go ahead and recondition the Leviathan out of an appropriation carried over from last year, and I believe that the House of Representatives as the guardian of the Treasury of the United States ought to have the power under its rules to stop a thing of that kind. I apprehend that there is no precedent for an extension of the Holman rule to that extent, but I contend that we ought to make such an extension here and now in order to stop just such things as this.

Mr. MANN. Does not the Holman rule and the rest of the rule that goes with the Holman rule relate only to the appropriations in the bill, the items in the bill itself?

Mr. DALLINGER. The gentleman is correct; but I wanted to bring this matter up at this time, because I believe that in the interest of economy there should be such an extension of the Holman rule. The Holman rule is to the effect that an amendment to an appropriation bill that alters existing law does not apply where such an amendment saves money to the Treasury, and that then the ordinary rule that an amendment to an appropriation bill changing existing law is out of order does not hold.

Mr. MANN. But the Holman rule is quite explicit as to how the money is to be saved. The gentleman thinks the rule ought to be so-and-so, but does he think it is so-and-so?

Mr. DALLINGER. As I stated to the gentleman, I think the rule ought to be extended to meet cases of this kind.

Mr. MANN. But does the gentleman think that the rule is extended to meet such cases?

Mr. DALLINGER. I stated to the gentleman that we have no precedent for that particular part of my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] makes the point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusettts [Mr. DALLINGER], although in the nature of a limitation and restriction upon the expenditure of money appropriated or provided for in the pending bill, the language "or which is now available for use of any independent executive bureau, board, or commission under existing law," applies to legislation heretofore enacted. The Chair would state that the rule the gentleman from Massachusetts relies upon, in the judgment of the Chair, does not apply or permit a limitation or restriction of the character of the gentleman's amendment upon moneys heretofore appropriated for or provided in previous legislation. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment in modified form.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DALLINGER: Page 27, line 19, after the words "$350,000," insert the following new paragraph:

"No part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing which, at the time of the proposed purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning can be manufactured, produced, repaired, or reconditioned in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased, acquired, repaired, or reconditioned otherwise."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. My point of order is that the amendment is legislation upon an appropriation bill; that it is not a negative limitation; that it is in the form of an affirmative limitation, which is not admissible under the Holman rule or any other rule. And I desire to be heard upon that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I answer the point made by the gentleman from Indiana?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, in the form in which I have offered this amendment it is substantially the same language as was held to be in order by Judge Saunders in the Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, the citation to which I just referred the Chair to on page 3731 of the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state what there is in his amendment which shows a reduction of the amount of money carried by the bill?

Mr. DALLINGER. I contend that this amendment is in order as a limitation, as was held by Judge Saunders.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; Mr. Chairman, I desire to make two or three propositions, which, it occurs to me, are fundamental and decisive. As I stated before, to make a limitation in order it must be a negative limitation. There is nothing upon the face of this amendment to show that there is going to be a saving to the Government or to the Treasury of the United States in expenditures.

The Chair appreciates the fact that the navy yards and arsenals of this country can not make competitive bids. The best that they can do is to make estimates. If the building of a particular thing is awarded to them and they fail to complete it within the estimate, then the Government is bound to pay whatever excess there may be over and above the estimate. It is all the more necessary in this case, I think, that the amendment should show upon its face that the proposal is going to result in a saving in public expenditures; and upon the proposition that it must be a negative limitation and not affirmative, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to section 3975, Volume IV, of Hinds' Precedents:

The limitation permitted on a general appropriation bill must be in effect a negative prohibition on the use of the money, not an affirmative direction to an executive officer.

This is not a negative prohibition or limitation, but it is an affirmative direction to a public officer, directing that in the event that any improvement is to be made it shall be made in a navy yard, provided it may be done at a sum less than it may be done for somewhere else.

I want to call the attention of the Chair further to the proposition that it is purely speculative, and that to make it in order there must be no uncertainty about it. It must be so clear to the mind of the Chairman that he has no doubt about it, and that no reasonable mind would have any doubt about the result.

Recurring again to the proposition I have made that the navy yards can not make bids, they can not bind themselves to do a particular kind of work for a particular sum of money. They may undertake to do it for that amount, but if they are low in their estimate and the cost is greater, the Government is bound by that excess. Whenever the Government undertakes to do a job of work at a particular price it is purely speculative whether they will do it within that price or not, while, on the other hand, when there is a contractual relation whereby the party undertaking to do a specific thing binds himself by contract, and under bond, there is an absolute certainty, as far as the determination is concerned, that that concern or individual is bound to do the work within his bid, so that it can be determined what the cost will be; and if that were the proposition here, the Chair could determine whether or not there would be a saving to the Government without speculating upon the proposition. But this is purely a speculative matter. Nobody is bound to do the thing within the contract. I do not wish to say that if the Government undertook to do this thing they would not act in good faith and honestly attempt to do the work within the price; but, upon the other hand, if they could not do it within the price, nobody would be bound. But if an outside party makes a bid and makes a contract, then he is bound, so that in such a case there would be no speculation. In this case it is purely speculative.

This can be in no sense a negative limitation or prohibition upon the expenditure of the public money, because of the fact that it does not show upon its face that it is a reduction, and it does not show upon its face that it will absolutely without doubt save to the Government the expenditure of money or result in a retrenchment in expenditures. Further upon that proposition I call the attention of the Chair to section 3957 of Hinds' Precedents, where this language is used:

Provided, That the authorization to have said battleships constructed by contract is limited by this condition: No such contract is authorized by the act in which said contract the contractor shall not have covenanted with the United States as follows.

And then it sets out the very language that I am trying to elaborate upon and bring to the attention of the Chair, that there is nothing to bind the Government. There is nothing that binds this Congress. There is nothing that brings to the attention of the membership here that if this thing were adopted it would, as a matter of fact, save the Government a dollar or that it would reduce the expenditure of public money.

Further, I call the attention of the Chair to section 3980. Mr. John Lind, of Minnesota, offered this amendment:

And provided further, That no money hereby appropriated shall be expended in the payment of salaries to rural free delivery carriers at a less sum for such service than $720 per annum—

The very language that is used in this amendment. In order to bring a provision of this character or an amendment within the rule so that legislation upon an appropriation bill may be admitted, there can be no uncertainty about the proposition that it will result in a reduction of the expenditure of public money, and it must be so plain upon its face that any reasonable mind can deduce that fact for itself.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. GALLIVAN. If the Chair is ready to rule, I do not care to discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires to discuss the point of order, the Chair will be glad to hear him.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Referring to what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] has just said, in the language itself there may not be shown a saving, but of course we know that if this amendment is adopted and the navy yards are given this opportunity unquestionably there will be a saving to the Government. The estimate of the Boston Navy Yard, submitted a year ago, for reconditioning the Leviathan was $2,000,000 below the bid of a private shipbuilding outfit. Here was an immense sum to be saved on a single job. In my opinion it can not be disputed successfully that this amendment, if adopted, will effect wholesale reductions in the expenses of the Government. I am not prepared to say that the language of the Dallinger amendment is so plain that on its face it shows a saving, but every man in this House knows that there will be a saving under that amendment, and I submit that the amendment ought to be held in order.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the amendment is negative on its face—it provides that no part of the money appropriated by this bill shall be used for the purchase or repair of any vessel or other thing from or by a private contractor where the same can be purchased or repaired for a less sum in a Government-owned navy yard or arsenal. It is an absolute prohibition and an absolute limitation. I also desire to call the Chair's attention to the fact that the argument of the gentleman from Indiana that the performance of a contract with a navy yard for a given contract price can not be absolutely guaranteed with a penalty as in the case of private contracts does not amount to anything when you analyze what the Shipping Board has done. I would like to call the attention of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole [Mr. WALSH] to his own report as chairman of the select committee of the House of Representatives appointed to investigate the Shipping Board under House resolutions 171 and 299 in the Sixty-sixth Congress to this effect:

Many instances of overcharges, defective work, and improper material in connection with repairs to ships, particularly in the New York district, have been brought to the attention of the committee, and especially with reference to payment of gratuities or bonuses by repair yards to officers of the various ships. This custom has been common in marine circles for many years, and there is no question that it is a vicious practice.

Mr. Chairman, if anyone will take the trouble to investigate the records of the Shipping Board, it will be found in most cases where the repair of vessels has been let out to private contractors that the repairs have cost very much more than the original contract price; the officials of the Shipping Board have changed specifications and added extras, and in that way private contractors have in many cases reaped enormous profits. As a matter of fact, the evidence shows that where the Shipping Board vessels have been repaired and reconditioned, and in many cases built by the navy yards, in only one case was the final cost more than the original estimate. In almost every case the cost was less than the original estimate, which shows, as a matter of fact, that in most every case there would be a saving by a provision of this kind.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Has the gentleman any idea how much cheaper the reconditioning of the Leviathan can be done in the navy yard at Boston—how much would the Government save by having the work done in the navy yard?

Mr. DALLINGER. I will answer the gentleman from Alabama by saying that, in my opinion, owing to the fact that the Government owns the dry dock and the work ways and the machinery, that the upkeep of a fully equipped shipyard is being carried by the regular naval appropriation act, that a full complement of skilled mechanics and supervisors is necessarily carried on the pay roll, and that almost all the material necessary to the reconditioning of vessels is already owned by the United States, there can be a saving of at least $2,000,000 in the case of the Leviathan; and further that there could be a proportional saving on all the other boats that are to be reconditioned by the Shipping Board.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. GALLIVAN. The gentleman recalls that the estimate of the Boston Navy Yard was $2,000,000 under the next bidder, which was a private shipbuilding outfit, and that since then the wages of the employees of the navy yard have been decreased 25 per cent, which would make an additional saving of $2,000,000?

Mr. DALLINGER. The gentleman is right; that is the fact.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, if the Chair is ready to sustain the point of order I have nothing to say, but if the Chair is inclined to overrule the point of order I would like to be heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. In the first place I shall not undertake to argue the merits or facts of the case. As I understand the proposition before the Chair it is a proposition of law rather than fact. In other words, it is the application of clause 2, Rule XXI, to the particular amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. If the amendment does not conform to the requirements of the rule it is not within the power of the Chair to take the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] or the opinion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] that vessels can be constructed in a navy yard at a less cost than in a private yard. For if the Chair were to undertake to go into that question there would be relegated to the Chair the question which should ultimately come to the House, if the proposed amendment is in order.

Now, it is conceded by the proponents of the amendment that it must come within the operation of the Holman rule. Then, in order to come within the operation of the Holman rule, it must come within the provision of one of two sections; in other words, it must be within the first part of clause 2 or within the portion of that part which comes under the proviso.

Let us see. The pertinent portions of the Holman rule read:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject matter of the bill shall retrench expenditures.

How? In a specific way:

By the reduction of the number and salary of the officers of the United States.

It does not do that.

By the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

It does not do that.

Or by the reduction of amounts of money covered by the bill.

There is nothing here to show that the amount of money covered by the bill is reduced by the operation of this amendment.

I do not have before me the amendment just as it was presented by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but I followed carefully the presentation of that amendment, and it seemed to be substantially the same as the former amendment, except that the gentleman from Massachusetts had eliminated from this amendment that portion of his preceding amendment which referred to the funds now available. I call attention to the ruling that was made by Chairman CAMPBELL of Kansas when the matter was before him on June 12, 1919, wherein he said:

The Chair is not aware of the amount or the extent to which expenditures could be retrenched or made. The Chair has endeavored without result to ascertain the amount, if any, that would be saved. In the Cavalry case it could have been figured out to a mathematical certainty just the amount that could be saved by the reduction of the troops of Cavalry.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts refer to the Cavalry case?

Mr. DALLINGER. A similar amendment was offered to a bill in the Sixty-sixth Congress, and the gentleman from Virginia, Judge Saunders, made the ruling at that time.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. I have considerable respect for Judge Saunders, but like the rest of us, he is not infallible. I do not find in my examination where any amendment similar to this has been attached, except, possibly, the amendment that was attached by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL], and at that time when the matter was first presented there was no argument upon the question at all. I submit that it can not be said under the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is a saving of the amount carried by the bill. Suppose that the estimate submitted by the navy yard is a certain sum and suppose that the bids submitted by the private yards constitute a less sum, yet if the bid submitted by the private yard equals the amount carried by the bill, then this amendment can not prevail. It does not follow that there is a reduction in the amount that is carried by the bill, and that is necessary in order to bring it within the operation of the Holman rule. Certainly it is not within the operation of the proviso in the Holman rule, because under the decision of Chairman GARRETT, under the decision of Chairman HULL, and, as I recall, though I was not able to find it, under a decision rendered by Chairman LONGWORTH at a time when he was in the chair, that amendment must come from the committee having charge of the legislation.

There is another proposition I wish to bring to the attention of the Chairman, and that is that it is a limitation upon the official discretion of the people charged with the expenditure of this money, such a limitation as that absolutely changes the law. Considerable has been said here about the bid that was put in by the Boston Navy Yard.

I shall confine myself strictly to the argument of what in law would be as on demurrer to the amendment that was submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts—not to a discussion of the merits of the question, because if the Chair wants to hear the merits of the question as they were developed in the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, I am prepared to discuss the merits.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not care to hear anything about the merits of the proposition.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. When the bid was put in by the Boston Navy Yard some time since, it was under a former law. In order that the Chair may have before him the law applicable to the amendment, permit me to direct the attention of the Chair to section 5 of the shipping act, which provides that this work may be done in a navy yard. So far as applicable, said section reads: "That the board, with the approval of the President, is authorized to have constructed and equipped in American shipyards and navy yards, or elsewhere, giving preference, other things being equal, to domestic yards, or to purchase, lease, or charter, vessels," and so forth.

Therefore, when the bid was originally presented, there was authority in law for construction there. The Chair is undoubtedly aware of the decisions that have been rendered by former chairmen on amendments that were offered requiring battleships to be constructed in private yards. The rulings were that such amendments were not in order. What is the situation under the Merchant Marine act, which became operative June 5, 1920? Under section 14 of that act the United States Shipping Board was given power to recondition vessels. The act provides that all vessels may be reconditioned and kept in suitable repair, and so forth. I call attention also to the fact that in the Merchant Marine act there is express repeal of section 5 of the shipping act, which authorized work to be done in the navy yards. Under section 14 of the Merchant Marine act there is vested in the Shipping Board certain discretion which this amendment takes away. This amendment authorizes Government-owned yards to enter into competition with each other and with private yards for merchant work. That is not provided in the law. In fact, there has been a repeal of that provision, namely, section 5, in the shipping act.

Does the amendment change existing law? It authorizes Government-owned establishments to enter into competition with each other and with private yards for merchant work. It disregards existing law for bonds and appropriate guaranties for satisfactory performance of work. It restricts the decision of the United States Shipping Board to sole question of cost, denying to them the right and power to consider:

a. Capacity of yard and ability to perform.
b. Reputation of contractor for good workmanship.
c. Skill of men employed in respective yards.
d. Location of competitors and possibility that weather conditions may interfere with work.
e. Labor conditions in yards of respective bidders.
f. Ability to perform in time.
g. Possibility of latent changes and work needed to be done to fully perform.
h. Many other elements which enter into a decision as to bidders.

The power of the Shipping Board is absolutely limited by this amendment to the sole question of cost. The sole question left with the United States Shipping Board is the question of cost, and even then under this amendment it is impossible to say that the amounts carried by this bill will be retrenched. Under the proviso the amendment does not come from the committee having charge of the legislation, and therefore can not be considered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia made a very able argument upon the theory that this amendment is offered under the so-called Holman rule.

I do not so understand it. The Holman rule, which is a part of paragraph 2, Rule XXI, is only a provision which affects legislation proposed on an appropriation bill.

> Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order—

Unless so and so.

The right of Congress to make an appropriation and the right to refuse an appropriation is quite evident. There is no power in the Government which can compel them to make an appropriation; and, having the right to refuse an appropriation, it has always been held that you can make an appropriation with the limitation as to its expenditure. We could make an appropriation to the Shipping Board with the provision that no part of it could be paid to any but red-headed men, if we chose to do so. A man would lose his job if his hair turned gray. We can make an appropriation with any limitation which is not an affirmative change of law. As I heard this amendment read, it is a pure limitation, it seems to me, on the appropriation, which can not be expended in a certain way.

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. May I add in reply to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], for whose opinion I have great regard, that authority may be found in Fourth Hinds', 4931 to 4935, to the effect that legislation may not be proposed under the guise of a limitation. I submit this is legislation which, with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois, changes the merchant marine act.

Mr. MANN. It does not change the merchant marine act at all. It has power to let the contract where it pleases, but it can not spend the money we appropriate except under certain limitations, and we have the right to make the limitations.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Under the amendment the only thing to bring it into question is where this operation might be done for a sum less. Are we to determine whether or not that can be? Is it not speculative? As a lawyer, does not the gentleman know that a thing that is speculative can not be entertained?

Mr. MANN. In the first place, we could put a limitation in which would require double the amount of expense, and we sometimes do. As a limitation it does not come within the Holman rule. If it comes within the Holman rule, the face of the amendment speaks for itself. It says it can not be expended unless it would cost more than it would in a navy yard. Whether it will cost more may be a matter of speculation, but on the face of the amendment it must cost less in the navy yard. I am not in favor of the amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I desire to be heard a moment. I know the gentleman from Illinois means to guide us aright. But here is still this procedure, and I think it is different from almost any other proposition that might come before this body. If this was a proposition wherein the Chair could decide that it was a competition between men who were bound by their contractual relations, it would be one proposition; but the Chair knows, and he is bound to know, that if this amendment is adopted it may mean what it says or it may mean nothing. He is bound to know that if there is any reconditioning or any work is undertaken in the navy yard upon the theory that it is to be done for less, but it results in costing more, the Government has got to pay it. Now, before this comes within the rule the Chair must know beyond the sphere of speculation or possible doubt that there can be no question about its resulting in saving money.

Now, I want to call the Chair's attention to the existing law that this thing will change and to which the Chair should give some attention in passing upon this important proposition. It would not matter, so far as this thing is concerned, one iota as to how the Chair rules, because of the fact that under the existing order of things and of appropriations all the things might be accomplished that this is aimed at. We are all agreed, I expect, that the purpose of this amendment is to provide that the Leviathan may be reconditioned in the Boston Navy Yard. I think that is agreed. It may or may not be under the law; it may or may not be, whether this amendment is adopted or rejected, if the Chair happens to hold it in order. Here is what I want to call the Chair's attention to—section 12 of the shipping act:

> All vessels may be reconditioned and kept in suitable repair and until sold shall be managed and operated by the board or chartered or leased by it on such terms and conditions as they may prescribe.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Indiana that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] read that provision.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The Chair is familiar with that. So that is the existing law. And this proposes a change. Now, then, if the Chair is warranted in changing that existing law, and he can only change it upon the assumption that this thing shows upon its face that it is going to save an expenditure of money, then when he is apprised of the fact it can not deceive the Chair, and it is then, in addition, adopted by this House for the limitation of expenditure.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the point of order? The Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. TAGUE. I want to call the attention of the Chairman to the fact that before his own committee the chairman of the Emergency Fleet Corporation made the statement that it would cost $650,000 to watch and police and repair the ships.

The CHAIRMAN. That has no bearing at all on the question.

Mr. TAGUE. It shows a saving, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] offers an amendment which he stated was offered as a limitation, which reads as follows:

> No part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing which, at the time of the proposed purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning, can be manufactured, produced, repaired, or reconditioned in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased, acquired, repaired, or reconditioned otherwise.

That is offered to a paragraph, beginning in line 6 and ending in line 19, but it applies to the appropriation made available in the pending bill. It raises a question of fact to be determined by those who make the expenditure at the time of the proposed expenditure for the purchase of a vessel, the acquirement of a vessel, the repair of a vessel, or for the reconditioning of a vessel, or at the time of the purchase of a commodity or other thing, namely, whether, as the amendment states, at the time of the purchase, acquirement, and so forth, the same can be manufactured, produced, repaired, or reconditioned at Government navy yards or arsenals for a less sum. As the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] well stated, the power of making appropriations rests with the Congress, and it is within the power of Congress, in making an appropriation, to make such limitations there as are within the rules of the House.

In the judgment of the Chair this does not repeal or modify section 12 of the shipping act, which was brought to the attention of the Chair by the gentleman from Virginia and the gentleman from Indiana. That is still the law, but with reference to appropriations in this act they can not be used, nor can any funds made available by this act be used for these purposes if the expenditure for the same purpose would be less than if made in or paid to a Government navy yard or arsenal.

Now, the precedents in Hinds' are numerous, and there are several which hold limitations somewhat similar to this as being not in order. But in many instances where the precedents in Hinds' are adverse to this amendment being within the rule, the amendments have imposed additional duties upon certain Government officials or departments, and have required them to perform functions which are not specifically laid down in the law. In the opinion of the Chair this matter raises a question of fact relative to a proposed expenditure to be determined by the authority making the expenditure, and this can be determined without imposing additional duties or in any way amending the law creating the organization which is to have charge of the expenditure. In the opinion of the Chair this amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER], is such a limitation as comes within the rules of the House, and many similar amendments have heretofore been permitted under many precedents in Hinds', and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If an amendment is offered as a new paragraph, would that prevent an amendment to the main paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that it would.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the paragraph itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will send up his amendment. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment to the paragraph just read, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 27, line 19, at the end of line 19 insert the following: "Provided, That in no event shall more than $250,000 of the sums appropriated by this act be used to pay the compensation of attorneys, regular or special, for the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, by this amendment I seek to limit the amounts which may be expended for attorneys for the United States Shipping Board and the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation. The present list consists of 78 attorneys at a total of compensation of $650,000.

I have been looking over the testimony in this matter, and I find that the testimony of Mr. Schlesinger, who I understand is the general attorney, is the one relied upon to justify the hiring of these 78 lawyers. I find also that Mr. Schlesinger undertakes to justify the paying of a good deal more money for these attorneys. I find that a number of these attorneys who are now working for the corporation for $11,000 and less were once employed at prices ranging from $15,000 to $25,000, and the man who employed them undertakes to justify the higher salaries. He first employed a Mr. Fletcher Dobyns for $15,000 a year, and he said that Mr. Dobyns had worked for the Government some 15 years ago at a higher price for some special work, and he makes out that he came here at a great sacrifice. But when the Congress at the last session made the limitation that no man should be paid more than $11,000, I find that Mr. Dobyns is still on the list. Maybe he is not the lawyer that he was 15 years ago or that he was last year.

Here is another one, Mr. William M. Bullitt. Mr. Schlesinger says Mr. Bullitt, to his personal knowledge, has generally earned from his law practice many times this salary. He says:

I persuaded him to come to Washington at $25,000 a year, which was a great financial sacrifice to him.

But if you will turn over the list of these 78 attorneys you will find that Mr. Bullitt is working for $11,000 a year. I am talking about the testimony of this man on whose testimony this Congress is asked to appropriate $650,000, who actually employs a man at $25,000 a year, which he says is a great sacrifice to him, but when Congress reduces it to $11,000 he still remains on the roll. I submit that if he has no better judgment of attorneys than to have it put over him that a man is making a sacrifice at $25,000 and he employs him at that figure, and when Congress places a limitation we actually get that same man at $11,000, he ought not to be given full authority to employ attorneys at a total expenditure of $650,000. Over here is another attorney that he mentions, Mr. Fairbanks. He says:

I sent for Mr. Fairbanks and offered him $10,000 a year to come with the board. He refused point-blank and told me he had been paid $12,000 when he was at the head of the War Claims Board. * * * I offered him $15,000, and he said he would come.

But, turning over here to the list, I find that he also, since the limitation was made, is working for $11,000 a year. It is strange that he should do that.

Here is another. I quote from Mr. Schlesinger:

The next one is Mr. Fairbanks, and we have already discussed him. Mr. Freedman is leaving us, and I have told you about Mr. Freund. He came from the firm of Sherman & Sterling. I took him from that firm and offered to pay him $25,000, and in view of the limitation of $11,000 salary which Congress imposed upon us, I feel badly for having done so. I think the Government should pay its attorneys what they are worth when they are unusually competent.

And yet this man who employed all these high-priced attorneys is seemingly accepted as authority that the board and corporation need all these lawyers.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think it is commendable that the board did keep its promise?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I most certainly do think it is commendable that they kept their promise, but they did not do it until Congress made them do it; and I say that men who have to be made to do a thing like that ought not to have $650,000 turned over to them, even with that limitation, to employ attorneys. I find that this same man, who is now working for $11,000, according to the testimony, practiced law in a small country town in Vermont and was earning somewhere between $3,000 and $5,000 a year. Of course, Mr. Schlesinger undertook to justify that by saying that he was interested in other things.

I also find on this list Mr. Caleb Powers at $5,000 a year. I understand that Caleb Powers studied law for the first time while he was in Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if I am in error somebody will correct me, but I am informed that Caleb Powers first studied law while he was in Congress. He is being paid $5,000 per year, and I do not suppose he is devoting all of his time to the Shipping Board. He is one of these field attorneys. Now, here is another man by the name of Aron, who still remains a member of his firm. He was employed at a sum considerably higher than he is now receiving. His salary was cut down and he also remained on the list, and also retains his firm connection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana, be it said to his credit, has tried to reduce some of these appropriations, and I think it would have been well if he had used a little of his ability in reducing the amount which is allowed to the attorneys for the Emergency Fleet Corporation. On page 1104 of the hearings the following occurred:

Mr. WOOD. You elevated that gentleman to $10,000 from a Government position at $4,000?

Mr. SCHLESINGER. No, sir; he was engaged at $10,000.

Mr. WOOD. He worked for the Government somewhere at $4,000 a year.

In 1919 he was on the Government pay roll at $4,000 per year, but he was engaged at a great salary, and then when we put on the limitation in the last appropriation bill he was retained on the salary list at $10,000 per year. I do not blame them for complying with the limitation. Of course they should have done so. They did that, but as is disclosed by the testimony they would have liked to spend a great deal more money than that for attorneys and would have done so but for the limitation. I firmly believe that with this $250,000 limitation they will be able to secure the services of attorneys sufficient to do the work, if they will get down and employ them on a business basis. The only limitation now as to the employment of the attorneys provided for in this section and the next section is that their employment must be approved by the Attorney General's office. Of course we know the amount of work that that office must do, and they follow the recommendation of these people to a large extent. When I was a boy we used to play a game called "I spy." We would hide a thimble or some other object and go around and hunt for it. They have attorneys hidden all through this bill. You would not have to go around playing the game of "I spy." They have not room to hide them all. Of course it is a trite saying that we must economize, but it does seem to me that they ought to be able to get along with less money than is here allowed for attorneys. The hearings last year showed that they justified much larger salaries for some of these attorneys. Some of them were employed at $15,000, $20,000, one at $25,000, and I understand one for even more than that. All of them except one, so far as I have been able to find, who were then on the list are still on the list, many of them at less than half what they were paid before. Now, if we get down on a business basis, if you would run this as a private concern would, as you would run it if you were the head of a corporation in which you were interested, do you not believe you could take $250,000 and get all the attorneys that would be necessary to do the work? I believe you could, and I believe any other good business man could. I believe if you place this limitation upon their expenditure for attorneys they will be able to do the work with that amount and with that limitation. Economy should be applied here as well as in all other departments of the Government.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, this item has reference to the attorneys of the Shipping Board, not of the Emergency Fleet Corporation. Many of the men mentioned by the gentleman from Texas are employed by the Emergency Fleet Corporation and not by the Shipping Board at all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. My amendment covers all the appropriations under this act.

Mr. DICKINSON. Oh, no; it does not. It could not cover them all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It does, anyway. Read it.

Mr. DICKINSON. As a matter of fact, there are only three attorneys employed in the Shipping Board. Mr. Schlesinger is employed at $10,000 a year. Anyone who knows the reputation of the firm of Levi Meyer, of Chicago, of which Mr. Schlesinger is a member, knows that he is not coming down here by reason of the amount of any salary he is receiving, because he is one of the highest class attorneys in the Middle West.

I want to say, gentlemen of the committee, that in my judgment instead of cutting the number of attorneys in this bill it would be a lot better if we would increase the number, say double it, and get a lot of this business off our hands, and get the court calendars cleaned up so far as the Shipping Board is concerned. You can cut down the appropriations all you want to here. You can cut out all the appropriations for the Shipping Board and for the Emergency Fleet Corporation, but you are still going to have all of these claims and all of these suits still pending, and the interest of the Government has got to be taken care of in court.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What real need is there for spending $37,000 or $47,000 for attorneys for the Shipping Board when their duties are practically duplicated by the legal department of the Emergency Fleet Corporation?

Mr. DICKINSON. The gentleman has not read the hearings.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have read the hearings.

Mr. DICKINSON. If the gentleman had read them he would know better than to make the inquiry.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I have read them and I do not know any better than to make the inquiry. [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Then the gentleman has not read them very thoroughly.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes, I have; will the gentleman state what the legal department of the Shipping Board does?

Mr. DICKINSON. That is evidence that the gentleman has not read the hearings, because the hearings show that they have got 3,500 suits now, many of them in the admiralty court of New York City. They are calling them at the rate of 12 per day, and you have in New York only 10 admiralty attorneys to take care of that work.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am speakng of the Shipping Board appropriation.

Mr. DICKINSON. They only have three attorneys employed in the Shipping Board proper. Has the gentleman any idea what the Shipping Board does?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Somewhat.

Mr. DICKINSON. They make the contracts.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does not the Emergency Fleet Corporation do the same thing?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Let the gentleman read the hearings. [Laughter.]

Mr. DICKINSON. I have read them and listened to them every day.

Mr. McDUFFIE. They have a bureau of research and construction——

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman understand that all the work of the Emergency Fleet Corporation must be reviewed by the Shipping Board and approved by it?

Mr. McDUFFIE. That is what I understood from the hearings, and the chairman of the Shipping Board says that the members of the Shipping Board are not expert enough to know anything about the operation of the fleet. I would like to know, if the gentleman has read the hearings and can answer the question, what the duties are of the attorneys for the Shipping Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me read this from the hearings:

> Mr. LASKER. Because under the acts of 1916 and 1920 we must scrutinize all foreign and United States laws affecting shipping; and the Shipping Board in addition has constant investigations and hearings that require legal guidance. The law department of the Emergency Fleet Corporation has to do with the defense of admiralty claims against the fleet, the defense of lawsuits, criminal prosecutions, the settlement of claims, and the drawing of contracts.

If the gentleman has read the hearings, he read all that.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes; but it does not say what the legal department of the Shipping Board does.

Mr. DICKINSON. Then the gentleman does not understand the English language, for it states what they do.

Mr. McDUFFIE. It states——

Mr. DICKINSON. I decline to yield further, the gentleman can get time of his own.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I will get some time.

Mr. DICKINSON. Now, we should not attempt to disorganize the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation. You can not wipe this thing out by disorganization. Mr. Schlesinger has come down here and I believe he is a man who would appeal to every Member of this House if he was brought before you, because he is an elegant gentleman and of very high standing as a legal authority.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Can the gentleman state whether or not these suits now pending relate to claims already pending?

Mr. DICKINSON. All of them.

Mr. DOWELL. And when these are disposed of it will dispense with the need of these attorneys?

Mr. DICKINSON. With the exception of what may come from the operation of the ships.

Mr. DOWELL. There appears to be a number of high priced attorneys. What I am trying to get at is when these suits have been concluded will there be other duties of a like character for them to attend to, or can we dispense with their further services?

Mr. DICKINSON. We can dispense with their services. Mr. Schlesinger states that he can reduce the corps of attorneys if he has sufficient number to clean up the suits and claims now pending, and then will only need a small number of attorneys to carry on the work of the Shipping Board when they once get down to a normal basis.

Mr. DOWELL. How long does the gentleman think that this corps of attorneys will be engaged under the present plan?

Mr. DICKINSON. He says to January 1, 1923, and he pledges us that the matter will be reduced to a minimum before that time.

Mr. DOWELL. How much will this board be reduced by that time?

Mr. DICKINSON. He said more than one-half.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What is the basis for this extensive admiralty litigation against the Emergency Fleet Corporation? Is that common to big merchant steamship lines, or is it exceptional?

Mr. DICKINSON. It is some of both, for the reason that many of these ships were operated by men who were not experienced. As a result they had accidents, due to errors of every kind, and they have been sued in the courts.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. So they have violated all the laws of land and sea?

Mr. DICKINSON. Absolutely; many, many times. That is the reason that we have to have this corps of lawyers, to get them out of this hole.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman, I would like to state that Mr. Schlesinger stated to me that he expected to reduce his force from 65 to 75 per cent when he got these back claims out. There always will be admiralty claims in connection with the operation of this emergency shipping board, and there will always have to be lawyers to attend to them, but back cases, running into some 3,000, to an amount of about $300,000,000, have to be cleaned up, and they are using these attorneys at the present time for cleaning up the back cases.

Mr. DOWELL. When this is reduced to the minimum, as suggested, what will then be the expenditures for attorneys, at the reduced number?

Mr. DICKINSON. He said it would be less than one-half. I should judge that he would put them at between 35 and 40 attorneys.

Mr. EDMONDS. And they would not be local to Washington?

Mr. DICKINSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did the committee make any inquiry as to what other companies engaged in the shipping business were paying to their attorneys? There are several very large ocean lines.

Mr. DICKINSON. We made that inquiry, and we found that they are paying so much more than is paid any of the attorneys in the Shipping Board here that there is no comparison at all.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Are they paying more than $35,000 a year to regular attorneys?

Mr. DICKINSON. There are no attorneys in the Shipping Board who are getting $35,000 a year.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. What is the highest that they are paying?

Mr. DICKINSON. In the Shipping Board, $11,000 is the highest any attorney is getting, and the shipping companies are paying much more.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. How much are the shipping companies paying for their attorneys?

Mr. DICKINSON. The testimony goes way up to $50,000 and $60,000 and $70,000.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Is there anything in the hearings at all to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do not know whether it is in the hearings or not. It is in our conversations.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I feel satisfied that it is not in the hearings.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The hearings do disclose this fact, that while the operations of the United States Shipping Board are greater than any other enterprise of the character that ever existed on the face of the earth, as compared with the attorneys employed in similar shipping concerns, we have not one-tenth the number of legal representatives that they have. In other words, there are admiralty lawyers in the city of New York that have more than 40 lawyers in one firm.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. And this firm is retained for some of these shipping concerns?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I would not say that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman said about 3,000 unadjusted claims, amounting to $300,000,000, are before the Shipping Board. The former Shipping Board took the position that they had no jurisdiction to settle a number of these claims with the wooden-ship builders. I want to ask the gentleman if the present board is assuming the authority to settle those claims without any additional authority of law?

Mr. DICKINSON. It is my understanding that they are seeking to adjust the wooden-ship claims.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And they have adjusted many of them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I always thought that they had authority to do that.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not think there is any doubt that they have authority to do that.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a statement here with reference to the per cent received. The other day I fell in touch with an attorney who is seeking the recovery of claims for property destroyed in the Minnesota fire, filed against the railroads, now to be paid by the Government through the railroad board. The court held that 20 per cent of those claims was a reasonable attorney's fee, while the whole Shipping Board business down here is being done at less than two-tenths of 1 per cent, figuring the expense of all of these high-paid attorneys that the gentleman from Texas is talking about.

Mr. McKENZIE. And it is fair to say in connection with this situation that hundreds of millions of these claims have absolutely no foundation in law or equity, or in good conscience.

Mr. DICKINSON. But the gentleman must realize that in order to disprove those claims, they have to go through and investigate them, which is an endless job, because they have to look up the merits and the demerits of the claim and investigate it just as though they were going to allow it or disallow it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate has been exhausted.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized in support of his amendment which, without objection, the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DALLINGER: Page 27, line 19, after the figures "$350,000," insert the following new paragraph:

"No part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing which at the time of the proposed purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning can be manufactured, produced, repaired, or reconditioned in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased, acquired, repaired, or reconditioned otherwise."

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to take up the time of the committee at length on this amendment, as it has already been discussed at some length under the general debate on this bill. But for the benefit of those members of the committee who may not have been present at that time, I simply want to call their attention to the fact that this proposition is not a new one. Substantially the same language which is incorporated in this amendment has been repeatedly incorporated in the regular military and naval appropriation bills, and also is incorporated in the Army reorganization act, which is the permanent law of this country.

So far as the arsenals are concerned, the law having been passed by Congress, the Director of the Budget has had issued an Executive order requiring every department of the Government to permit the arsenals of the United States to bid upon all Government work, and they are doing it. Moreover, as I shall show in detail later, there is no trouble whatever, but, on the contrary, the system is working satisfactorily and has resulted in a saving to the Government.

Now, as a matter of fact, this amendment is of interest to the entire country, because there are a good many vessels besides the Leviathan that will probably be reconditioned. And I am absolutely satisfied that the Government of the United States, with this amendment and an Executive order issued requiring that the navy yards and arsenals be permitted to estimate and submit bids on all Government work, millions of dollars will be saved. It stands to reason that when you have these navy yards and arsenals maintained at public expense with a skilled corps of expert machinists and naval officers detailed to shore duty by the Navy Department, all carried on the pay roll, with the material necessary for the reconditioning of these Shipping Board vessels already on hand, the only cost to the Government in having these Shipping Board vessels reconditioned in the Government navy yards is the extra labor that will have to be called in. And it is perfectly evident to anyone who studies the question that an immense saving may be made.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Leviathan has been brought prominently into this debate because bids have been asked for and are about to be awarded on this vessel. It is understood that the contract will be awarded to the lowest bidder, which was submitted by a concern in the district of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND], for whom I have the highest regard, but it is in the evidence, that in the seven or eight million dollars it is proposed to pay this private concern, as has been pointed out in general debate, there is an item of $650,000 for the expense of moving this vessel up to the Boston Dry Dock, and about $350,000 more for watchmen, inspectors, and similar expenditures, all of which would be unnecessary if the vessel is reconditioned at the Boston Navy Yard. So on these items alone you would save $1,000,000 by having the work done at Boston. The same unnecessary expenditure is going to happen in case of the other vessels which the Shipping Board is planning to recondition unless my amendment is adopted. All my amendment provides—and I ask any Member to stand up and give any good substantial reason against it—is that if this Government work can be done more cheaply with the plants, men, and materials we have on hand, it should be so done. If the work can not be done cheaper, then the amendment is inoperative.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The claim was made by some one that the Government might think they could do it cheaper, and yet they could not be governed by their bid, and therefore the Government would be stuck eventually. Now, has the gentleman any knowledge of any case where the navy yards have made a bid where they have kept within it, or where they have gone above it?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, the facts show that in every case except one, where the navy yards have been given these vessels in the past the repairs have cost less than the estimates. There was one case where they exceeded them. But I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that if he will examine the records of the Shipping Board, he will find case after case of vessels given out to private contractors that cost very much more than the original contract price on account of extras that were added afterwards.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Can the gentleman state about how many cases he knows of where a navy yard has done this work and kept it within bids, naming the cases?

Mr. DALLINGER. I can not give you the names of the vessels.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Can you give me the number?

Mr. DALLINGER. There were a good many.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Were there a dozen?

Mr. DALLINGER. I should say that there were at least a dozen. I wish to repeat that there was just one case brought to my attention where the cost exceeded the estimate.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. What case was that?

Mr. DALLINGER. I can not at this minute remember the name of the vessel.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. How much did they exceed the estimate in that case?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. What is there in the present condition of shipping circles that would make it wise to undertake this tremendous expenditure for reconditioning this ship, the Leviathan? What is the idea of reconditioning it at this time, with shipping conditions in the state they are now?

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I am not here advocating the reconditioning of any vessels. I simply say that if any of these vessels are to be reconditioned they should be reconditioned at the cheapest possible cost.

Mr. WALSH. I did not know but that the gentleman had gone into that question and knew upon what theory this work was to be undertaken.

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand that the Committee on Appropriations, at the time we had the hearings before the subcommittee, was informed by the Shipping Board that, if the Leviathan was put in condition, the Government could get a favorable contract with a private company by which the Government would receive in rental 10 per cent on the money invested by the Government in the vessel.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, they have had that offer outstanding for many months.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows that if it would cost $6,000,000 to recondition the Leviathan, it would be worth only $4,500,000 when the work was finished.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I am not here advocating the reconditioning of any vessels. I simply say that if you are going to have them reconditioned, this extravagant and outrageous expenditure incurred by the Shipping Board should be stopped. These vessels should be reconditioned in the most economical manner, and to that end you should use the Government navy yards for that purpose when you have navy yards and the taxpayers are paying for their maintenance.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The amendment forbids an expenditure by the Government for the purchase or making or repairing of any commodity or article which can be purchased or repaired cheaper from a navy yard or arsenal. Now, suppose a vessel needs some article of machinery in Hongkong; suppose it needs an article of machinery such as can be manufactured by a navy yard in the United States. Does the gentleman think it would not be wise to have that purchase made over there?

Mr. DALLINGER. The same provision was carried in the Army appropriation bill in regard to Government arsenals, and no objection was made to it.

Mr. MANN. But we have no Army there.

Mr. DALLINGER. It was also carried in the naval appropriation bill, and so far as I know, there has never been any complaint as to its working. There is no American navy yard over there, and I have never heard of any trouble.

Mr. MANN. Naval vessels, as a rule, carry enough people along with them to make all the repairs and manufacture all the supplies they need, but that is not the case with merchant marine vessels.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. Is not this the answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that by this means it could be done cheaper?

Mr. MANN. It does not say so. It says it can be purchased in the navy yards cheaper.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the practicability of repairing the Leviathan and similar vessels in Government navy yards, I wish to call the attention of the Members to the testimony before the select committee on the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation at New York City May 10, 1920, as appearing on page 1265 of the committee hearings. Mr. Robert L. Hague, director of construction and repair of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, in reply to the question of the chairman:

> Now, if I understood you this morning, you stated that the navy yard at Brooklyn had reconditioned some ships?
> Mr. HAGUE. Yes, sir.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. Did they do that work—did they submit competitive bids against other concerns?
> Mr. HAGUE. They did it in one instance; in the case of the Callao. They furnished an estimate. It was also then competing with commercial concerns. In the case of the Martha Washington and in the case of the Moccasin we did not ask other commercial firms to figure on the job. We gave it to the navy yards direct.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. But, in your opinion, was the work which they did upon those ships such as to lead you to believe that the navy yard could handle the work on the Leviathan?
> Mr. HAGUE. Yes, sir; handle it in a very satisfactory manner.
>
> The CHAIRMAN. And as economically as could be done through other arrangements, competitive bidding?
> Mr. HAGUE. Yes; that is my opinion.

In addition to what I have already said, I wish to submit the following summary of a few reasons why the Leviathan should be assigned to the Boston Navy Yard if she is to be reconditioned:

1. This yard underbid other yards nearly $2,000,000 when estimates were requested on this work in 1920.

2. Boston has the only dry dock on the Atlantic coast capable of docking this ship.

3. Because of the commendable work accomplished on similar ships taken over by the Government during the war, namely, the Mount Vernon, America, and George Washington.

4. There are no profits to consider.

5. The necessity of Government inspectors is eliminated.

6. The Boston Navy Yard is a military necessity. This work would help to maintain a competent force of skilled mechanics.

7. All employees of the navy yard are American citizens.

8. The Shipping Board has announced its intention to thoroughly Americanize its forces.

9. If alien labor is not dependable as a part of a ship's force, it is not dependable as workmen engaged in repair work.

10. In response for bids on this work in 1920 private yards declined to submit bids and recommended it be done in a Government yard.

11. On account of lack of work many navy yard employees are receiving but two or three days' work a week.

12. Both the Shipping Board and the navy yard are governmental departments.

13. Naval experts from the Boston Navy Yard have spent considerable time in going over the ship and specifications and are well qualified to go through with the work to be done.

14. Quality and costs of work done at the Boston Navy Yard is second to none.

15. This work would undoubtedly require more men than are now employed in the yard. Boston is recognized as the home of the most competent ship builders and repairers.

16. If this work should go to private yards they would of necessity have to figure the additional costs of paying for the use of our dry dock.

I desire also to present for the consideration of Members of the House the following summary of additional reasons for the adoption of my proposed amendment to House bill 9981:

1. There exists in the various supply bases of the Navy Department a very large surplus of materials manufactured for the most part during the war. Material and labor costs were then at the peak of high prices.

2. The Shipping Board, also a Government agency, like the Navy and Army Departments, has need of a large quantity of the surplus material held principally by the supply department of the Navy Department.

3. These facts are well known to the officials of the Shipping Board, but who are unable to procure this surplus material because of the high price at which the surplus material is held by the Navy Department.

4. To specify: The Boston yard has approximately 350 tons of manila rope of the highest quality, held at a price of approximately 28 cents per pound. The Shipping Board has need of large quantities of manila rope, but is unable to purchase from the Navy Department at the price held by them for this material.

5. The officials of the Shipping Board therefore purchase manila rope for their needs in the open market, at present approximately 18 cents, at the expense of the Public Treasury.

6. Again, the raw material of which manila rope is manufactured is held in large quantities at the top prices of the war period by the Navy Department. The raw material in some cases being higher in price than the present market value of manufactured rope.

7. The chain department of the Boston yard manufactures the highest quality chain cables in this country at lower costs than outside manufacturers, as was evidenced by their recent competitive bid to manufacture and furnish the chain cables for new battleships now building.

8. Due to lack of funds and a surplus of chain cables in the chain stores, work in the chain department is virtually stopped.

9. The equipment of the chain department is in every way suitable for manufacturing standard chain cables as specified by the American Bureau of Shipping. Navy regulations, however, forbid Government yards from estimating or bidding on work other than for the Navy Department.

10. The forge department of the Boston yard has exceptional facilities for the manufacture of chain appendages, such as swivels, chain stoppers, connecting shackles, bending shackles, and, indeed, all manner of shackles used on chain for any purpose, and is fully equipped to test same.

11. "Buy it from the Navy" should be carried forward so that other Government agencies, such as the Shipping Board, could purchase materials or have them manufactured on terms equal to any terms that may be gotten elsewhere, and thus secure a notable saving of Treasury funds and reduce the unemployment of loyal American citizens in Government yards, than whom there are none higher skilled in their respective trades.

Finally, in order that the Members of the House may understand the practical results of the adoption of a similar amendment to previous military and naval appropriation bills, I submit herewith a summary of all orders placed with arsenals by arsenal orders section, May 11, 1919, to May 14, 1921:

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few observations that certainly will not be partisan and which can not be anything but impartial, because I have no interest whatsoever in the question, and yet what I say might be deemed in the interest of those shipping yards controlled by the Navy Department up in the far eastern corner of the United States, up in Massachusetts. But I do say that in this matter we ought to apply the rules of common sense. There is not a man within the sound of my voice who, if he had the facilities for doing work for himself, would go outside and pay somebody else more to do the work than he could do it for himself. And that is all there is in this proposition.

The Government by force of necessity is compelled to have some navy yards capable of constructing or repairing vessels. The Government is compelled to operate and pay for the vast overhead and operating expense of those yards, and the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] is that where the Government has work to be done that must be done, they shall have it done in those navy yards, if the navy yards will do it cheaper than the private contractor will do it. I do not care whether you are a Democrat or Republican or Socialist or Populist or bolshevist, you should have a little common sense and let our own instrumentalities serve our own wants and needs when they can do it cheaper than somebody else can or will do it for them. [Applause.]

That is all the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts is. It ought to be adopted.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe you could put a more harmful amendment on this bill than this amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER]. If we were operating these ships in this country and were trying to build up our merchant marine between the ports of the United States, it might be true that we could well afford to ask the navy yards to do our repair work. But these vessels are scattered in all portions of the globe. They have to have work done to them probably in every port they go into. They may be in Hongkong. They may be in Europe. They may be in the Mediterranean. They may have to have a small amount of work done or a large amount of work. This amendment even requires small repairs to be made and to be paid for in the navy yards.

My experience in looking over the bids for the Shipping Board—and I have had some considerable experience in looking over the bills of the Shipping Board—has been that in the past whenever it was possible and a navy yard was available, it was asked to bid on the work. The navy yard makes an estimate on its work. Nobody ever knows if it keeps within the estimate or not, and as to the time of finishing there is no penalty.

A great many of these ships are worth anywhere from $1,000 to $5,000 a day if you hold them up. They go to a navy yard and the navy yard does the work on them in its own way and in its own time. The demurrage and the loss occasioned by the delay is very frequently larger than the cost of the repairs. I saw a case the other day where $93,000 worth of repairs were made to a ship and the demurrage from loss of operation was $48,000. That was the estimate made by the Shipping Board. So, you see, if you limit this to a purely Government repair proposition, you are certainly going to hamper the economical operation of the ships. As a matter of fact, I advocated with Admiral Benson that all repairs as far as possible be made in the navy yards, and since that time the Shipping Board, wherever possible, where it did not require a large sum of money to move the ship, or where they could get proper attention in proper time, have sent the ship to the navy yard; and I think if we should say that it is the understanding of Congress that wherever it is possible the navy yards are to be used, that would be a perfectly proper amendment, but to require a strict mandatory provision like this would simply hamper the merchant marine by doing exactly what you ought not to do.

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the House will not be misled by the statements just made in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS].

First of all, I want to say to the House that there is no desire on the part of the proponents of this amendment to hamper in any way, shape, or manner the private shipyards all over the country or to prevent them from bidding upon this work. All that we ask is an even and an equal opportunity with the private yards for performing repairs on Government vessels in navy yards; simply the opportunity to compete in the open market for the Government work and give the Government the benefit of a saving. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has questioned the repairing of ships in the navy yards, and I am going to take issue with him upon that very question. It is true that navy yards can not make a stipulated bid, but they can make estimates, and if the Shipping Board would accept estimates from the Boston Navy Yard on the Leviathan there would be a saving, and I think I know whereof I speak.

To my knowledge there has not been an occasion, at least at the Boston Navy Yard, where estimates have been made by the Navy Department and accepted by the Shipping Board where the navy yards have exceeded the estimate made. On the contrary there has been a saving on every occasion except one of from 15 to 25 per cent on every estimate that has been given. The work has been done in better time than by private shipyards. Now, no matter how you argue on this question, there is a saving to the Government in every way, shape, and manner. First, the Government is maintaining these navy yards and arsenals at great expense. They are there. They are paid for by the people's money. When they lie idle they are an expense to the Government. Second, in private shipyards the repairs must be supervised by the inspectors of the Shipping Board. When the work is done in the navy yards that supervision is not required, because the work is done under the supervision of Government-paid employees. When a ship is put into a private shipyard, according to the testimony of Mr. Powell before the Committee on Appropriations, watchmen must be paid by the Government. That is not required in the navy yards or arsenals, because the marines and the soldiers are in these institutions now working for the Government and are receiving their pay, so that no additional policing force is needed. And that is a big item. The Members from the districts in which there are navy yards come before the House and ask, as a matter of fairness to men who have given the best that is in them and the best years of their lives, an opportunity to continue the work that they have been doing for the Government for 15 to 25 and 35 years. If you gentlemen could come into these districts and see men who have reached the age of 60 years, who have worked for the Government 25 years and are now being thrown out on the highway without an opportunity for employment, you would believe with us that we are doing something not only for the Government but for humanity. When a man reaches that age no private shipyard wants him, but still he is a good workman, a first-class mechanic. These men are entitled to some consideration from this House, when it takes into consideration that they have for years been faithful employees of the Government. That, Mr. Chairman, is one of our claims. All we are asking of this Government is to give the Boston Navy Yard and other navy yards of the country an opportunity to show whether or not they are able to compete with private concerns for repairing the Leviathan. The estimates we will make will not be beyond those of private yards. We will not only live within the estimates but we have saved the Government from 15 to 25 per cent on every job that you put in these yards, and we will save the Government about $1,000,000 on this job. In addition to that, we will employ citizens of the United States, and nothing but citizens of the United States. [Applause.] We will employ men who have not only worked for the Government but men who gave their boys to the Government when the Government made the call. I contend that they are entitled to your consideration, and no matter what arguments the opponents of this proposition may make I claim it is going to work a great benefit to the Government and simple justice to the citizens of this country. [Applause.] I hope the amendment will prevail.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I should like to see if we can agree upon some time for closing debate upon this amendment. We want to complete this bill to-day. There may be some more amendments before we get through with this, and we ought to get along with them.

I ask that the discussion of this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, in which time I desire five minutes myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Reserving the right to object, I hope the gentleman will make it 45 minutes. There are at least nine men on their feet now asking for time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I thought I counted all gentlemen on their feet, but I will say 35 minutes, and that will give plenty of time.

Mr. GALLIVAN. There are three or four members of the committee who want to speak, and some not on the committee—can not the gentleman make it 45 minutes?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will make it 40 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that debate on the paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 40 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the principal point that has been made against this amendment is the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. He caims that this amendment is unworkable. I do not agree with him. The amendment says:

> No part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing which at the time of the proposed purchase, etc., can be repaired or reconditioned in a Government navy yard.

I think that means purely and simply such reconditioning and general repairing as is ordinarily done at the home base of the vessel, and does not at all refer, nor would any court construe it as referring, to the ordinary small things purchased in a foreign port and necessary to get the ship to the next port of entry. It does not apply to an emergency purchase, but only to a reconditioning, which is always done in the home port.

Let me suggest to you that there is a good reason why the amendment should be adopted. If any of you live in a place where they have a Government institution and know the conditions, you would take a different view of it. If we all had our way about it we would have no navy yards and arsenals, because they are things that have to do with making war. But we have to have them. They are absolute necessities. They are located at various points of vantage all over the United States, and it is is essential that they be kept up and in good running order, so that when war does come we will have these institutions to produce things that we have to have to make war with. The weakest point in our national defense at the outbreak of the last war was the fact that we could not produce the things that we had to have at these Government institutions. We had permitted them to deteriorate and run down until they were not able to produce the things that we had to have, and we had to buy them from private individuals and pay ten times what we ought to have paid if we had been careful and made proper preparations.

Let me call attention to one thing that illustrates it as well as anything ever brought to my attention. We were making at the Rock Island Arsenal, in the district that I have the honor to represent, the Army Springfield rifle, and we were making that rifle for $13. It was the best Army rifle in the world, and the workmen were so skilled and the process so perfected and the machinery so good that we could turn them out for $13 apiece. We paid $50 for the British rifles which we used during this war, and which we had to buy because we did not have the dies and gauges in the arsenal by which we could produce the Springfield guns. We could have made them for one-quarter of the expense that we had to pay. The same is true of ships as of guns. The thing to do is to keep the shipyards and arsenals running with a good personnel of skilled men, who by a life of activity and skill and practice have become proficient in the production of these things. You can not do it unless you adopt measures of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I listened with great interest to the speech of the gentleman from Texas, Judge HARDY, and if those present paid as strict attention to his appeal as I paid and really want to save money for the taxpayers of this country, they will agree with me that his argument was all-persuasive and all-convincing, and no other word is necessary.

I do not like to be up on my feet now and then because I happen to be a member of this committee, opposing some action which has been taken by my associates on the Appropriations Committee; but the Dallinger amendment, in my judgment, solely means, if adopted, a saving of millions, and as a member of the Appropriations Committee I have pledged my loyalty to that committee that I will join my colleagues in every effort to save money when I can see an opportunity to save it.

Here is an opportunity to save millions. If the navy yards of the country are not equipped to do this work, are not bound to live within their estimates, why were the navy yards invited a year ago to submit bids for reconditioning the Leviathan? That happened, and the Boston Navy Yard was the lowest bidder. It was $2,000,000 under the bid submitted by the only other bidder, a private shipbuilding concern, the Todd Shipbuilding Co., of California, I believe. Yet since the Boston Navy Yard made a bid of $2,000,000 less than the other bidder, the wages in the navy yards of our Federal establishments have been reduced 25 per cent, and if they are permitted to estimate on reconditioning the Leviathan at the present time there would be an additional saving, I am reliably informed, of $2,000,000 more. I hardly dare venture the claim that they would be $4,000,000 less on a $10,000,000 proposition as against an outside bidder, but unless the wages have been reduced in the outside shipyards as they have been reduced in the Federal establishments I repeat that there would be an additional saving of $2,000,000 in labor.

My colleague spoke of the fact that if you permit this work to be done in Government yards you are going to employ the citizens of this Republic. Yes; and you are going to give employment to thousands of service men who answered the call to the colors, and who when they came back to these shores were given employment in the navy yards. Since then they have been thrown out onto the highways because the appropriations for the navy yards of the country have been reduced. Hundreds of service men in the city of Boston alone, and I have been informed thousands of them in the city of New York and in the city of Brooklyn, have been discharged from the navy yards within the past 12 months. Give these Federal establishments an opportunity to compete in work of this kind and against the private yards, and you will be keeping your word to the boys who took every chance and went overseas in 1917.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Mr. Chairman, high freight rates are the principal cause of our business troubles, rendering capital unproductive and causing unemployment of and consequent distress to the workingman. Export trade in coal to South and Central America lost. British coals landed and sold in American ports at prices less than the actual freight on American coals.

American merchant marine idle. Freight rates must be reduced.

Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration has to do with appropriations for the Naval Establishment, the Shipping Board, and the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

For decades it has been the dream of the American people to see an American merchant marine reestablished—the American flag flying upon every sea and in every port. The war from which we only recently emerged seemed to bring the dream within the realm of reality. Billions of dollars were spent in building ships of the various classes. Many of the ships, especially the wooden ones, proved to be worthless, but others, numbered in the thousands, were of the most approved and modern type of merchant and passenger seagoing vessels. It is said that over half of the number of the new ships are now tied up for want of business.

The fleet for the past 12 months has been operated at a loss of many millions of dollars. In the meanwhile the British steamship lines have been most active. The British have completely recaptured their coal trade, not only throughout Europe, Africa, and parts of Asia, but in South America, in the West Indies, and in Central America as well; but further than that they have gone. They are now putting down in the harbors of New York and Boston the very highest grade of British admiralty coal at the price of $4.75 and $5 a ton. The cost of this coal on board vessel is probably greater than the price obtained, but the English Government stands the loss. The vessels carry the coal as ballast. The English board directing such affairs acts with quick decision and plenary power. English trade and commerce must be maintained. Shrewd British minds, trained for a thousand years in maritime trade, are out to maintain English supremacy in the business of the world. And what are Americans doing to defend and protect their own rights? The American merchant marine seems to be a big joke, judged from the standpoint of the foreigner, but from the viewpoint of the American taxpayer, shipper, and workingman it is no laughing matter.

Mr. Chairman, why is it that we are rapidly losing our foreign trade? Why is it that with over half of the world's supply of coal—the highest grade of coal and the easiest to mine—that we have not only lost our export business but even our bunker business—the ships of foreign registry bringing enough coal to last them for the round trip—and, furthermore, have allowed foreigners to ship coal into the United States from Nova Scotia, British Columbia, England, and other countries? Literally "carrying coals to New Castle." The following is a clipping from the Seattle Daily Times of December 11, 1921, on which it appears that 22 coal dealers are advertising coal from far-off Australia:

Americans should read this advertisement with shame and humiliation. The State of Washington in 1920 produced 3,750,000 tons of coal, and yet 22 firms in one of its principal cities are selling coal from Australia. The advertisement I have read was sent me by Capt. W. J. O'Toole, of Welch, W. Va., with the following letter, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

CRYSTAL BLOCK COAL & COKE CO.,
Welch, W. Va., January 3, 1922.

Hon. WELLS GOODYKOONTZ,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As you are well aware, the coal exporters, Department of Commerce, the railroads, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Shipping Board have from time to time considered the deplorable condition of the coal export market; the coal exporters have maintained all along that nothing short of a reduction of $1 per ton in the tidewater freight rate would be of any help, and have contended for the prewar rate of $1.40, which would mean a $1.40 reduction. There seemed to be some hope of accomplishing something along these lines until the railways absolutely refused to make any concessions in the final conference in Washington just before the holidays.

You are entirely familiar with the effect British competition is having on this locality, and the loss of business to the country as a whole. In line with this I inclose a letter from my father and a clipping from the Seattle Daily Times of December 11, which contains an offer of Australian coals, and which may be of interest to you. The point that impressed me is that it is possible to purchase Australian coal in this city from 22 different retailers, showing that it is not an isolated case or a "fluke." This in a State which produced 3,750,000 tons in 1920.

There is no question but that something will have to be done. Just what the proper procedure is I do not know. Our idea has been for an export freight rate, but this seems to have gone "by the board." If we are to maintain our markets in the United States, the West Indies, and South America, this or a like concession, some place, will have to be made.

Very truly yours,
W. J. O'TOOLE,
Vice President.

Some days ago at a meeting of the West Virginia Coal Operators' Association, of which organization Mr. J. G. Bradley, of Dundon, W. Va., is the president, and Mr. W. H. Cunningham, of Huntington, W. Va., is the secretary, the following resolution was adopted:

Whereas the loss of the export trade on West Virginia coal is in so large a measure due to the present high freight rate to tidewater; and, further, since a reduction of $1 per ton in the export rate to tidewater will enable West Virginia coal operators to successfully compete with foreign coals in foreign markets to the extent of a very large additional tonnage over what is now being hauled to tidewater by the various West Virginia railroads: Therefore be it

Resolved, That our vice president is authorized in the name of the West Virginia Coal Operators' Association to urge the presidents of the railroads carrying coal to Atlantic tidewater from the West Virginia coal fields to agree to immediately reduce the export rate on coal $1 per ton.

Mr. Chairman, I regret to say to you that the railroads have paid no heed to the resolution. The railroads are "standing on their rights"; that is to say, the right to maintain the rate regardless of its effect on their own business and the business of the country.

Gentlemen, you will readily see that the railways, if allowed to have their own way, will sooner or later go bankrupt and at the same time bankrupt the country. This they will do unless rates are reduced.

The Interstate Commerce Commission should fix a reasonable rate, a rate that will allow commodities to move. The commission's sole duty is to fix such reasonable rate. The commission should not be concerned regarding the decisions of the Labor Board on the subject of wages. The latter organization will be held strictly accountable for its own performances.

When rates have been made fair and reasonable the movement of freight will demonstrate what reductions, if any, in the cost of labor shall be necessary to protect the capital invested in the railway properties.

Old-time railroaders, such as Jim Hill and Collis P. Huntington, put on "all the traffic would bear," but these pioneers were smart enough to put on not more than the traffic would bear.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has put on more than the traffic will bear. Conditions such as this should not be allowed to exist. Why are the railroads and their employees idle? Why are coal operators and other producers going bankrupt—their men without work and suffering? Why is it that the cost of living remains high, notwithstanding the farmer gets very little for his hard-earned supply of foodstuffs? The answer is, because railroad and steamship rates are too high. Traffic can not move. The rate on coal from the Pocahontas field to New England is around $7 per ton, and yet British coal is being put down in Boston at $5 the ton. The British shipping board has already taken away our South American and Central American trade and is now encroaching upon our domestic business. The Interstate Commerce Commission is now sitting, hearing evidence on the question of railroad rates. The evidence in chief will be put in in January, the respondents will offer their testimony in February, the rebuttal will come in March, the briefs will be filed in April, and then there may be oral argument in May, and in June, perhaps, we will have a decision. It may be that further delay will occur, and that summer will be gone and the snow again falling before the country gets any result from that hearing. I am almost in favor of abolishing the commission. It is a kind of vermiform appendix. The members of it ought to know what the country needs. All the evidence and the testimony, written and oral, have often been heard before; it is the same old story. Our miners are appealing for help, our coal operators are losing money, and the public clamoring for cheaper coal. We can not ship coal to New England and buy New England shoes unless we have a rail and water rate that will let it be done. The question is, How long is the country going to tolerate the action, or rather, want of action, of the Interstate Commerce Commission in substantially causing and continuing the business paralysis of the country?

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Has the gentleman ever thought it might be wise to put a little high light under the vermiform appendix?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. What is needed is a surgeon's knife, for use in lopping off the offending organ, which seems to have lost its function.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does not the gentleman think that Congress is not entirely faultless in laying down a standard for rates that has compelled the Interstate Commerce Commission to act?

Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. Not at all. The commission made the rates too high, and thereby decreased railway revenues, and, as a result, impaired net earnings. When the carrying charge is made so high, so unreasonable and exorbitant, as to kill business, the carrier, the employees, and the public must jointly suffer.

Hon. Herbert Hoover, one of the greatest industrial organizers and possessing a very brilliant mind, has appealed, but thus far in vain, to the intelligence and patriotism of the railway executives for a reduction in freight rates, especially on export coal. If the railway executives do not hear the voice of Mr. Hoover it may be that the members of the Commerce Commission may hear him.

If the commission shall, with folded hands and in cold indifference, further disregard its duty to the country, then perhaps Congress, the creator of the commission, can prescribe a remedy.

In my country coal is king. Unless coal shall be mined and marketed there is no employment for the miner, no profit for the coal operator, no business for the railroads, no work for the railway employees, no deposits for the banks, no money for the landlord, the merchant, or the farmer.

In the present circumstances freight and water rates must be radically reduced. The result should be reemployment of railroad men and seamen, activity at the coal mines—we should furnish at least half of the export coal of the world—a general resumption of business, and a return to prewar conditions.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, under existing law, is the only power authorized to reduce freight and water rates. With the vast corps of clerks, investigators, experts, and helpers provided by Congress for the assistance of the commission, that tribunal should be ready to act at all times. The fact is that the commission and the Labor Board, for a long time, have been making faces at each other—the one saying to the other, "It is your move first."

Let the commission fix reasonable rates. That is the first move to be made. After that shall be done all other matters and things will be adjusted in harmony therewith. I respectfully insist that the Interstate Commerce Commission should act, and act quickly. Knowing the character and ability of the officials of the four great railroads that traverse my district, I confidently believe that these officials fully realize that the interest of the roads, the employees, and the public, jointly and severally, demand that there be an immediate reduction in rates.

The very great financial investment, the vast number of men whose employment is their only means of support for themselves and families, and the general welfare of all the people in my district, as also elsewhere, are the factors which have actuated me as a Representatives of the people in directing public attention to the urgent need of an immediate drastic reduction in freight rates.

Business men have marked inventories down to the very bottom. Losses have been written off. Economies have been introduced in every line. Federal appropriations have been reduced to the minimum. Deflation in loans and of the currency has progressed to the limit of safety. The wheels of industry are ready to go round, except for just one thing, the excessive freight rates that are crushing the life out of business. Until freight rates are reduced there can be no resumption of trade and industry. When that barrier is removed the country, under the administration of President Harding, will go forward to an era of tranquillity and unparalleled prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. BLAND of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the distinguished gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. TAGUE and Mr. DALLINGER] is based largely upon humanitarian grounds. The humanitarian needs of the section from which I come are just as great as the humanitarian needs of the sections from which these gentlemen hail. That is not the question that is to be considered by you. It has been charged that if this work goes to a private yard, it will go to a yard in which aliens are employed. I have ascertained the facts. Even during the period of the war the maximum alien percentage of employees in the Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock Co. was 2 per cent. Can gentlemen on the other side show any better figures than those? The maximum aliens employed today are 65, or about 1 per cent. Can they show any better figures?

The majority of the workmen in this yard live in Newport News or in Warwick County. According to the census report of 1920, 5.8 per cent of the population of Newport News is foreign born, and in Warwick County eight-tenths of 1 per cent. The argument is made that Boston boys went to the other side to fight. Mr. Chairman, the boys of Newport News sleep in the fields of Flanders and of France. Ex-service men are employed in the Newport News yard. If you are going to decide upon that ground, we have just as much claim as the people of any other section; but it is not upon these grounds that this matter is to be determined.

Let us not make comparisons as between sections of this great country of ours. Gentlemen, I make no invidious arguments against the people of Boston. I could not if I would; I would not if I could. Ah, gentlemen, let us get down to the facts. You have the reasons for work in the private yard set out in the letter of the Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby. Do you want to repudiate him? I submit that there is not a man in the Cabinet of the present administration better qualified to pass upon any business subject, who is more intelligent, who is more honest and more patriotic than the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby. He says to you that the Navy yards are not prepared to do this work. Does not Mr. Denby know more about the work in the navy yard than the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DALLINGER, or the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TAGUE, or the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GALLIVAN?

If that is not believed to be true by you gentlemen of the majority, I submit that the resignation of the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Denby, should be in order, and the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. TAGUE, or the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. GALLIVAN, or possibly one of his own party, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. DALLINGER, might qualify as Secretary of the Navy.

You have said that you are going to put business in Government and that you are going to take Government out of business. Are you proposing to do it now? You propose to strike down the business interests of your country when your own Secretary of the Navy tells you the navy yards are not prepared to do the work. You have his letter, and it will give the reasons upon which his conclusions have been based. There is not to be found in all of this record a better summary than that made by the distinguished Secretary of the Navy, Mr. Denby. I am asking you simply to support him and to act upon what he tells you is the true and the proper thing. The men of Newport News have been as loyal and true as those anywhere else, but it is not a question of the men of Newport News or the men of Boston. It is the interests of the country which are involved.

When this matter was considered formerly, it was said that the employees of the private yards were aliens and slackers. I have answered the alien charge. The slacker charge, so far as the Newport News yard is concerned, is just as unfounded. I do not know the men of other yards, but I do know the men in the Newport News yard, and I know that no more loyal, patriotic, and deserving people can be found anywhere in the United States. They have never held up this country, and they never will. They want what they win by merit. They want that, and that alone. It is for these men that I am pleading.

Criticism has been made formerly of Mr. Ferguson, president of the Newport News yard. He is a North Carolinian by birth, a Virginian by adoption, a man of sterling worth, and unimpeachable integrity, who has forged his way to the front as one of the world's greatest shipbuilders.

Charges are made that the bids put in are $8,200,000. The hearings show this to be erroneous. On page 1166 of the hearings, it is said:

> In estimating the cost of reconditioning the Leviathan, the following figures have been used: The Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. bid for reconditioning and conversion of the vessel to burn fuel oil, $5,595,000. The Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. bid for repairs and machinery of the Leviathan, $515,000. The bid of Gimbel Bros. for equipment of steward's department of the Leviathan was $539,000; alowance for library, not included, $15,000; (1) cost of moving the ship to the contractor's yard, (2) insurance covering moving vessel to the contractor's yard, (3) dry docking for 30 days, (4) new anchors and chains, (5) moving of ship to dry dock, and (6) cost of the trial trip, $627,000; maintenance of steamer and guarding ship for 14-month period during reconditioning—you understand we have to have this big force on board taking care of her all the time the work is being done—$650,000; inspection during reconditioning, $225,000; making a total of $8,166,000.
> So far as it is humanly possible to foresee the work that is to be done its cost is covered by the above estimate, and there are items there that we ought to save enough on to make good any small, unforeseen things that may not be covered. So that when we say $8,200,000 will put that ship in condition to sail from New York on her first voyage with passengers, I believe we are properly covered, and are giving you a figure that is thoroughly justified.

This does not mean that the items for insurance covering moving vessel to the contractor's yard, cost of moving to contractor's yard, dry docking for 30 days, new anchors and chains, moving of ship to dry dock, and cost of trial trip, aggregating $627,000, will be entirely spent. Nor does it follow that the items for watchmen and inspection will be spent. The effort is made to give the maximum figures so that Congress may know the fullest charge this work will impose on the Treasury.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, if this amendment is adopted it will probably tend to do more harm to my district than good. I happen to have in my district some of the largest shipbuilding yards in the world. During the war the private shipyards on San Francisco Bay gave employment to about 75,000 men and the facilities then employed are still available. A little over 30 miles away is the Mare Island Ship Yard. So I have no political interest in the adoption of this resolution. I think there is a principle involved in it that ought to actuate us beyond any selfish consideration. I do not know of any branch of the Government service that has suffered more from graft since the Spanish-American War than those departments of the Government that had to do with ship-repair work. That applies as much to San Francisco as to any other section of the country. And if this resolution does not do any more, it will provide a check on expenditures—it will provide one in my section of the country—because the men in the navy yard and the officers of the navy yard will watch these ship-repair contracts of the Shipping Board that are being let all along the Pacific coast. The same will apply to Seattle, where they have the Bremerton Navy Yard, and to Boston, and all over this country, and it will apply to Norfolk and every place else; and I think we need some one that is interested in this matter to watch this work closely just as the Boston Navy Yard is doing in the case of the Leviathan, and in the next few years the Government will save a lot of money.

I want to read a paragraph of a speech made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], when we were considering the deficiency bill on August 12 last, providing over $40,000,000 for the Shipping Board. I want to call your attention to what the former officials of the Shipping Board did in entering into contracts with private shipbuilders for the construction of this fleet that we are talking so much about. The gentleman from Illinois said:

> With the lowering of wages and the lowering of material costs, I thought, and your subcommittee thought, that the Government ought to save money in the construction cost of these ships, and we inquired as to whether or not the Government was to get the credit for any reduced cost of material or any reduction in wages. And the reply came that the Government divided that saving with the contractor, so that he, in addition to his commission on the cost-plus plan, shared equally with the Government the saving made by lowering prices and lowering wages, a very unfortunate sort of a contract, because it certainly ought all to come to the Government. But it does not, and we are not to blame. We believe that it is not good business, but that it is bad business. It can not be remedied during this construction period when these contracts exist. They will be finished by the 1st of April.

Can you imagine, gentlemen, any official of the Government of the United States entering into a contract that will mean taking out of the pay bags of the men employed in the private yards one-half of the money saved by a reduction of their wages? Can you imagine any official of the Government of the United States entering into a contract that would give shipbuilders 50 per cent of the reduction in the cost of material? That is what was done by the old Shipping Board. Those contracts are still in existence, and they are going on until such time as those contracts are finished. That is the situation regarding the private shipbuilders of this country. They have taken out of the pay bags of the men since the war ended one-half of the money involved in two different wage slashes whereby the wages have been reduced over 25 per cent. One-half of that has gone into the coffers of the shipbuilders; one-half of the savings on material has gone there. You must have some sort of a check to break up this sort of business.

This thing might not accomplish all its proponents desire, but I say to you I think it is a wise provision in this bill, and I think this House ought to adopt it, so that somebody besides interested officials and interested contractors will be watching over these contracts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, there are some facts which should be remembered by the House in passing on the pending amendment. It applies alone to ships owned by the Government, and which Congress has directed the Shipping Board to sell to private parties. It develops from the hearings that the Shipping Board has practically concluded a contract with a private company for the reconditioning of the Leviathan at a total cost of approximately $8,200,000. This proposed action on the part of the Shipping Board has suggested this amendment, since two Members of the House from Massachusetts have assured the House that if this work on the Leviathan is done in the navy yard at Boston about $2,000,000 will be saved to the Government. The purpose of the amendment is to give the navy yards a fair opportunity of bidding on the reconditioning of the ship. The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] has called attention to the fact how the amendment will serve as a check system. Its adoption may restrain the Shipping Board from making unwise contracts relative to repairs and reconditioning of vessels. If the question was directly before the House as to whether this large sum of money should now be expended on reconditioning the Leviathan I question whether the House would authorize it. In the consideration of this bill we can not withdraw from the Shipping Board the authority heretofore conferred by law in reference to the reconditioning and repair of vessels, but we can at least place a limitation on the appropriations carried in this bill that will give assurance that all work done on our ships will be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder.

The objection announced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] that if the amendment is adopted it may cause serious inconvenience and loss by delaying repairs on ships abroad, if there be well-founded ground for such fear, can be easily met by an amendment providing that it shall not apply to repairs abroad or to repairs costing $20,000 or less in home yards.

Remembering that the amendment is evidently aimed at what is thought to be an unwise contemplated expenditure of money on the Leviathan, it is well to recall that we are now about to complete the last of 19 new passenger ships, and that $12,000,000 additional will be asked of Congress in the next deficiency bill for the completion of these ships. No one has been able to guarantee that all of the passenger ships we now own and which are in good condition can be profitably operated. The statement is even made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] that the chairman of the Shipping Board admitted in a hearing before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries that the Leviathan, if reconditioned, could not be sold for exceeding $6,000,000. Now, the House can very properly and should by this amendment require that in the expenditure of appropriations carried in this bill contracts for the reconditioning of ships shall be given to navy yards, where the navy yards can do the work at less cost to the Government. We are told that business men of Boston, speaking through the chamber of commerce and acting in conjunction with the workmen of the navy yard, are prepared to offer proper bonds of indemnity, guaranteeing that the work on the Leviathan can be done in the navy yard at a large saving to the Government, and that it will be completed within the time limit fixed by the Shipping Board.

Some one may suggest that the navy yard is not authorized to execute a bond of this kind. That is true, but a bond executed by private parties, guaranteeing the faithful performance of the navy yard proposal if accepted, will be upheld by the courts. The principal of law authorizing a third party to execute a bond, guaranteeing the performance of a contract entered into by a minor, can be applied in a case of this kind.

The navy yard is prepared to do this work and the proof before Congress is, it will give employment to deserving workmen, and will result in a very large saving to the Government. Now, I do not wish to be understood as advising or approving the proposed reconditioning of the Leviathan, but if this work is to be undertaken, then I am interested to see that it is let to the lowest responsible bidder, so that the Government will not be required to pay an unreasonable sum therefor.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, but I have not got it fully drawn yet. I think it will meet the objection offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. However, I will have it ready to offer at the close of the debate. The amendment will be to the effect that this limitation shall not apply when the same work can be done as economically elsewhere, and it will provide that in estimating the same all costs in connection with such work shall be considered. I think this amendment, on the whole, is a good one, and, with the amendment which I expect to offer, there can be no reasonable objection offered against it.

I want to say, however, at this time, that I am entirely opposed to reconditioning the Leviathan at all.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. My understanding is that the chairman of the Shipping Board said that if we reconditioned the Leviathan the Shipping Board might sell it for about $6,000,000. It will cost about $8,000,000 to recondition it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I understand $7,000,000 is the latest estimate. I made two voyages on this vessel, so that I think I know something about it. The proposition is to change it from a coal burner to an oil burner. As originally constructed by the Germans, this vessel had a self-stoking apparatus in it. That self-stoking apparatus was not in working order when our people took possession, inasmuch as there was not sufficient time allowed in which to restore the apparatus, and the vessel had to be fired by hand. But I do not believe—and I understand the Director of the Budget is of the same opinion, and I understand every naval officer who has given an opinion takes the same view—that this vessel will ever be a paying success in practical operation, but will simply be a white elephant on our hands, with endless expense. When you consider that even the Germans could not make the vessel pay before the war, with their low scale of wages and with their system of efficiency, how can it ever be expected that we can make it pay?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HULL. Is it not true that if you put on this amendment you will remove the incentive to having it reconditioned?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. To some extent I think that is true, and that is one of the reasons why I make this suggestion.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, how many trips did the Leviathan make when it was in German hands? Was it not one only?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. One or two; but I understand it did not pay.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. What would the gentleman think of an amendment to the effect that no part of the money appropriated in this act should be used for the reconditioning of the Leviathan, so that we would positively express our judgment that it should not be done?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would be heartily in favor of that amendment. It would not possibly be so easy to pass that as the amendment we have pending.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am not talking for that amendment at present, but after this amendment is acted upon.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am for it. I want to cut down these expenses in every practicable way. I insist that it is the height of folly to spend $7,000,000 on this vessel and turn it into an oil burner in order that it may be used in the passenger traffic. A vessel of that size and the expense of running it, burning oil, can not ever be made, under American operation, to pay in the Atlantic traffic.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The time has been fixed by the committee.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of the proposed amendment is that in the event that the Leviathan is reconditioned, it may be reconditioned in the Boston Navy Yard. I congratulate the gentlemen who are proposing that this thing be done. On the other hand, I have no objection to those who are desirous that it may be done in the Newport News Shipbuilding Yards or in the Norfolk Yards. I have no brief for either of these institutions, but I do wish to call to the attention of this committee something that may happen in the event that this amendment is adopted, that is of great consequence to the future not only of the Shipping Board, but possibly to the future of the establishment of our merchant marine. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls attention to the dire consequence that might come in the event that this was established. Now, remember that the gentlemen who are proposing this amendment have in view the reconditioning of the Leviathan. But it does not stop with that. It proposes that any work that may be done for less money in the navy yards than some place else must be done there. Now just consider for a moment the predicament in which we would find ourselves. The Shipping Board have vessels operating upon the seven seas. There is not a place around this globe which does not behold the American flag flying under the direction of the Shipping Board. Now, suppose that away across on the other side of the globe, along the farther shores of darkest Africa, or away around on the other side of the earth, something happens to one of these vessels that necessitates its reconditioning. Before that can be done they must ascertain whether or not the work can be done more cheaply there than here. What is going to happen to the shipping industry of the United States Shipping Board?

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER. Is the gentleman not aware that a far-fetched apprehension like that could be met easily by a simple amendment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not know whether that can be done or not; but I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it is far afield, and even if this amendment is adopted it will not accomplish the purpose at which it is aimed. It can only be mischievous; it can only be hurtful. It can not accomplish the purpose for which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] spoke, or the purpose desired by those who are speaking in favor of this work being done in the navy yard in Boston, having in mind that it is to apply to the reconditioning of the Leviathan. The Leviathan will be reconditioned irrespective of this amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask the gentleman just one question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Just wait a moment now. That being true, then what is the purpose of this amendment? If it is passed in the language in which it is now couched, it can only result in doing the very thing to which I have called your attention—that is, that it will absolutely destroy the practicability of the working of this great Shipping Board. We have to-day 82 of these routes, operating from every great port in this country to every great port in every foreign land. Accidents may occur anywhere. Vessels may be so crippled that before they can be useful again they must of necessity be put in some yard to be reconditioned. If this amendment were adopted that could not be done until they found out whether they could do the work for less money in the navy yard at Boston or some place else than they could wherever the vessel might be.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment, which I hope will meet the suggestion of some of the gentlemen, because it limits the application of this amendment in cases where the amount involved is more than $25,000.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I offer it as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute offered by Mr. McDUFFIE for the amendment offered by Mr. DALLINGER:

"No part of the moneys appropriated or made available by this act shall be used or expended for the purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing which, at the time of the proposed purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning, can be manufactured, produced, repaired, or reconditioned in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States for a sum less than it can be purchased, acquired, repaired, or reconditioned otherwise, provided the cost of the proposed purchase, acquirement, repair, or reconditioning of any vessel, commodity, article, or thing involves a sum of money exceeding $25,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think my amendment to the amendment, being a perfecting amendment, takes precedence of the substitute, does it not?

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the Chair would have no means of knowing that. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is a perfecting amendment to the amendment, and I think would take precedence of the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa to the amendment of Mr. DALLINGER: Add to the Dallinger amendment the following:

"Provided, That this limitation shall only apply to vessels while in the harbors of the United States, and all expenditures in connection with such work are to be considered in estimating the cost."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The point of order is sustained. The gentleman's amendment being a perfecting amendment, the question is first on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I accept that amendment to my amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McDUFFIE. I now reoffer my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. McDUFFIE].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. McDUFFIE) there were—ayes 25, noes 69.

Accordingly the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as a new paragraph offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER] as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the investigation of foreign discrimination against vessels and shippers of the United States, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, actual necessary traveling expenses, and per diem in lieu of subsistence when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, $20,000.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 21, after the words "United States," insert "and for the investigation of transportation of immigrants in vessels of the United States Shipping Board."

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, so far we have been providing most of the money needed by the Shipping Board. We now have an opportunity to lay the foundation whereby the Shipping Board can make money. During the year ending July 1, 1922, there will be about 350,000 immigrants coming to this country. These immigrants are almost entirely being brought in ships belonging to foreign corporations, not in ships owned by the United States. The 3 per cent immigrant limitation law will terminate July 1. A new immigration law will permit a fewer number coming to this country. I believe without any additional cost or expense, while there is an investigation of the foreign discrimination against vessels of the Shipping Board of the United States, as is now provided in this section, the same investigators can determine whether or not it is feasible to bring these immigrants to our country in our own boats. They are coming here by our permission, by our sufferance, and we should utilize and provide that 50 per cent of those coming to our shores should reach here in our own vessels. I understand that Mr. Lasker states that the Shipping Board can make money by this proposition. It is a subsidy that will not cost the taxpayers a single cent. It is a chance to encourage the shipping and save the taxpayers some money, and for that reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I offer this amendment in absolute good faith, for the reason that the investigation for which this $20,000 is proposed to be appropriated has already been conducted. Mr. Lasker and the Shipping Board have investigated this very problem, including the one embodied in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE]. As a result of this investigation Mr. Lasker has had prepared and has distributed to different members of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries a very exhaustive and very voluminous report of this investigation, in which all these matters are dealt with. He has further stated in the hearings that he was going to make a recommendation to the President as a result of these investigations of the plan which he and the Shipping Board thought should be inaugurated along this line. We see in the press that Mr. Lasker has appeared before the President, and in a consultation of more than an hour laid his plans and recommendations before the President. It is further said that within a few days the President will appear before Congress and make recommendations in consequence of those investigations and recommendations. In view of that situation, what is the need of continuing this investigation at an expense of $20,000 additional? In view of these facts I insist that this amendment ought to be adopted and the $20,000 saved to the taxpayers of the country.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word. I do not desire to detract a thing from what the gentleman from Tennessee has said. You will notice in reference to the appropriation of $20,000, whatever may be the conditions to-day may not be the conditions a year from to-day. There is the constant competition, and there will be more when trade starts up and more necessity for investigation as to what discriminations may be. There may be no occasion for the use of this appropriation, and there may be much occasion for the use of it; and if the occasion arises there ought to be some means whereby it can be made. I am hopeful, as is the gentleman from Tennessee, that there may no occasion arise, but we know in the strife of competition many things may occur. It has involved a greater question, one that has attracted the attention of the Congress, the discrimination in transportation in this country even among our own people. If we can not depend on justice here, how little can we depend on foreign countries when it comes to a question of this character? So I think it would be unwise if we did not make some provision in some way for an investigation if occasion arises for it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think, in view of the vast fund in the possession of the Shipping Board, that they can afford to use some of that in making some investigation?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. As I say, this appropriation is not for what has happened, but it may be with reference to what may happen, and we would be very derelict, it occurs to me, unless we provided for that some means if the occasion demanded.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that this would not be a drop in the bucket?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It would not amount to much, but we should have a little water in the bucket in case of fire.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not the gentleman also think that every merchant vessel owner will be interested in reporting the discriminations of the Shipping Board.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Possibly that is true, but those reports would come with more or less selfish interest, and we ought to have a little bit of leeway so as to decide for ourselves in making these investigations.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. What kind of traveling expenses would be involved, and per diem in Washington, toward making investigations in this and foreign countries?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is speculative and problematical.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Is not that whole section a sort of anchor to the windward?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it is just simply a precautionary proceeding.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. It developed on the hearing in the bill that we are now considering appropriations for the Department of Commerce, that the foreign attachés are rendering very helpful service to the Shipping Board and other departments of the Government in just this kind of work, and they have at practically all of our ports very capable men who, under directions from the Shipping Board, could gather information of this kind, and it seems to me to be an unnecessary expense.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman offers a very valuable suggestion, and I wish to say that by reason of that we have reduced it to the minimum; but even if that were true, it would take something to assemble the information.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How much did they ask for it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. One hundred thousand dollars, and we reduced it to $20,000, so that I think we have gone our length, and I think we ought to be sustained in the recommendations we have made.

Mr. OLIVER. Since under other appropriations if it becomes necessary to make this investigation, they will be authorized to expend money for this purpose, would not the inclusion of a special appropriation for that purpose be a direction by Congress that it should be done?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do not think so. I think it should be accepted as we have stated it here, and as we have recommended that if it is needed for this purpose it may be had, and if not provided we will find ourselves or might possibly find ourselves in an embarrassing situation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 15, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

EMERGENCY SHIPPING FUND.

For expenses of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, for administrative purposes, miscellaneous adjustments, losses due to the maintenance and operation of ships, for the tie-up, reconditioning, and repair of ships, and for carrying out the provisions of the merchant marine act, 1920 (a) the amount on hand July 1, 1922; (b) $50,000,000: Provided, That no part of this sum shall be used for the payment of claims other than those resulting from the current maintenance and operation of vessels: (c) the amount received during the fiscal year 1923 from the operation of ships; and (d) $55,000,000 from moneys collected from mortgages, leases, accounts and bills receivable other than those arising from current operations, and from moneys collected from the sale of ships, plants, material, securities, and other assets, prior to July 1, 1923, less such portion of said $55,000,000 which shall have been collected during the fiscal year 1922 under the provisions of an act entitled "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and for other purposes," approved March 4, 1921.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against subdivision (d), beginning with the figures $55,000,000, on line 15, down to and including the end of the paragraph. It is legislation on an appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his ground.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That there is no authority of law for the legislation contained in subdivision (d). There is no legal authority for the provision authorizing the use of $55,000,000, derived from the sale of assets, for the purpose of paying the administrative expenses, miscellaneous adjustments, and tying up of ships. There is no law authorizing it.

The CHAIRMAN. This matter has been called to the attention of the Chair by the parliamentary clerk. Section 11 of the Shipping Board act provides in general terms that the board, if in its judgment such action is necessary to carry out the purposes of the act, may form under the laws of the District of Columbia one or more corporations for the purchase, construction, equipment, lease, charter, and so forth, of merchant vessels in the commerce of the United States. It also provides that the total capital stock thereof shall not exceed $50,000,000. Under this provision the Emergency Fleet Corporation was established. Does not the gentleman think that the powers are broad enough to cover the proposition involved in the right of Congress to make an appropriation for the purposes specified in this provision?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; but I am satisfied that the Chair does not get the point of order. I did not think it would be contended that it was in order. I know that last year, when the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the point of order, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Good, conceded it. I call this to the attention of the Chair, that the language in subdivision (d) provides that the money collected from mortgages, leases, accounts, and bills receivable from the sale of assets may be used for administrative expenses. There is no authority in the law cited by the Chairman which would authorize the Shipping Board to sell assets or to collect money on accounts outstanding and use that money for the purpose of paying the administrative expenses of the Shipping Board.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entirely correct, and the Chair was calling attention to the fact, as the Chair supposed it to exist, that there was authority in existing law for making the appropriation. If that is granted, the question is as to whether or not the provision in this act changes existing law. Upon that proposition, of course, the Chair has not yet even made a suggestion, but the Chair would call the attention of the gentleman to a line of authorities which would seem to the Chair to indicate that this appropriation might be made without its being considered as a change in existing law. Here is a fund that has been derived under the operations of law constituting an unappropriated fund not yet placed in the Treasury of the United States. The question is, under those circumstances, has the committee authority to make appropriations directly of such an unapportioned fund? There is a line of authorities which the gentleman will find in the fourth volume of Hinds' Precedents, commencing with section 3591, which hold unequivocally that a reappropriation of an unexpended balance for an object authorized by law may be made in an appropriation bill. We have now this proposition: Here is an object which appears to be clearly within the purpose of the law. Here is an unappropriated fund not yet conveyed into the Treasury that may be subject to this appropriation act. Does the gentleman believe that under those circumstances a point of order could be sustained by the Chair? If the gentleman will pardon me, I am trying to ascertain his point of view in order that he may meet the point of view that is in the mind of the Chair.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I think I can do that immediately. I think possibly the Chair has not had his attention called to section 14 of the merchant marine act of 1920. That section specifically provides, as to the proceeds of sales, operations, and other activities prior to June 1, 1921, that shall be covered into the Treasury, making certain exceptions. Then there follows this language: That after July 1, 1921, such net proceeds, namely, net proceeds derived from the activities of the board, less such an amount as may be authorized annually by Congress to be withheld as operating capital, and less such sums as may be needed for such insurance and construction loan fund, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts.

Now, to fully understand this latter part of the paragraph the Chair should read the first part of the paragraph, which provides that the net proceeds derived by the board prior to July 1, 1921, from any activities by reason of this act or by the act specified in section 2 of this act, except such an amount as the board shall deem necessary to withhold as operating capital for the purposes of section 12 and for an insurance fund authorized in section 10 and the construction loan fund authorized in section 11, shall be covered into the Treasury. So that the Congress is authorized to deduct from the net proceeds derived from the activities of the board an amount to be used for three purposes, and three purposes only: One the insurance fund as provided for in section 10, the other the construction loan fund provided for in section 11, and the third for operating capital for carrying out the provisions of section 12. Now, when you look at section 12, you find it is a section authorizing the chartering of ships for the purpose of operation by the board, so that Congress can authorize a deduction from the net proceeds for the insurance fund, for its construction fund or for operating capital to carry on the operation of ships, and for no other purpose. Now, what does this bill do? It provides that this $55,000,000 shall be available for what purpose? Not for the loan fund, construction fund, or operating capital but for the administrative purposes of the United States Shipping Board. It therefore changes existing law. In addition to administrative purposes, the bill provides that this $55,000,000 shall be available for miscellaneous adjustments and payment of losses. Is there any authority in the merchant marine act of 1920 to use the net proceeds for the payment of claims? It is authorized for other purposes, and this language is a change of the law as contained in the merchant marine act of 1920 and is not in order.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, in opposition to the gentleman from South Carolina, I wish to assert and show there was authority to prove that this is only not in order but in entire consonance with the merchant marine act. In the first place and as a premise, I shall call the attention of the Chair to the fact that it is the duty of the Appropriations Committee to appropriate money for the expense of the Government. Section 3 provides that "an appropriation of the revenue for the support of the Government, to the Committee on Appropriations." Now, there is a certain latitude allowed the Committee on Appropriations in its discretion, wisely administered, for this purpose. We can appropriate directly out of the Treasury for this purpose, or we may direct that certain revenues derived from certain services, already coming from certain sources, may be used for specific purposes. Now, that being true, I think that we are clearly within our rights when we say that certain moneys derived from certain sources may be used as a part of the operating expense of this corporation.

Here seems to be the difficulty, and I wish to call the attention of the Chair to this fact. The United States Government is engaged in private business, and I expect this is the only example we have got before us at this time. For the time being, and until we can dispose of it, we are conducting the greatest business on the face of the earth, and it is peculiar in this respect, that in order to protect the best interests of the country, provision must be made to so conduct it, to conserve that interest until it may be disposed of. Now, then, the committee in its discretion has seen fit to reappropriate whatever balance may remain out of this $55,000,000 existing on the 1st day of July, 1922. Now, instead of doing that thing, we might have appropriated directly this sum of money, but in order to best serve the interests of the country we thought best to reappropriate or to make possible the use of this appropriation.

Now, that being true, we are clearly within the provisions first established by the rules—that it is the duty of the Appropriations Committee to appropriate money for the expenses of the Government. We have elected to do it in this way. Whether we have been wise or unwise in doing that thing is a thing for this House to determine, but I insist that we had the right to do it under the act, section 3591 reading:

The reappropriation of an unexpended balance for an object authorized by law may be made on an appropriation bill.

Now, that is what we have done, for the act creating this commission, or creating this Shipping Board, the act creating this activity, makes it incumbent upon them to maintain this establishment. And upon that proposition I desire to call the attention of the Chair to this section 12 of the merchant marine act that reads as follows:

That all vessels may be reconditioned and kept in suitable repair and until sold shall be managed and operated by the board or chartered or leased by it on such terms and conditions as the board shall deem wise for the promotion and maintenance of an efficient merchant marine, pursuant to the policy and purpose declared in sections 1 and 5 of this act.

And so forth. Now, then, if that is correct, we have by affirmative law imposed upon the Shipping Board the doing of the very thing we are trying to give them the money to do.

And as I stated a while ago, whether we give it to them directly out of the Treasury of the United States or give it to them by a reappropriation or by an authorization to expend unexpended balances, that is a matter in the discretion of Congress, to be recommended by the committee either for approval or disapproval on the part of the Congress.

I desire to call attention to what the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has said in support of his position to section 14, where it is provided that after July 1, 1921, such net proceeds, less such amount as may be authorized by Congress to be withheld as operating capital and less such sums as may be needed for insurance, and so forth, shall be covered into the Treasury.

We have done the very thing that Congress has provided we might do. We have provided that an amount less than the amount received by them shall be covered into the Treasury, for we have provided that out of these collections, that may have been made after the expiration of the limitation that has been put upon the expenditures under the present bill, they may continue to apply them to the operating expenses. It is an annual appropriation. It is an appropriation put in this annual appropriation bill for the current expenses of this activity during the current fiscal year.

This is perhaps a matter of fact, rather than a legal proposition, but it is within the province of Congress under the present law governing the Shipping Board to take and collect the entire amount of this $50,000,000, so that there will not be a dollar of it at the expiration of this present fiscal year, but in order that they may have some discretion to enforce these collections, in order to collect as much as possible, we have extended this proposition. But it is within the province of the Congress to reappropriate under the section that I have called to the attention of the Chair whatever may be unexpended at the expiration of this fiscal year, to be applied to the expenditures under the next fiscal year.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, may I call the attention of the Chair to this fact, that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] referred to the right to appropriate an unexpended balance, whereas the provisions of this bill specifically direct that there is to be no appropriation of an unexpended balance? The bill seeks to make available only such amounts as shall be collected after July 1, to wit, in the year 1923. In other words, the merchant marine act simply provides that the net proceeds shall be covered into miscellaneous receipts with the exception of three specific funds, and this bill seeks to extend the purposes for which those funds may be available.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The first problem before the Chair was stated by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], although the Chair was informed that the point of order had been conceded by a former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations.

Of course, we are all familiar with the proposition that legislation on an appropriation bill is not in order. There must be an authorization under existing law upon which the appropriation may stand, or it must fall. In this instance we have, as it seems to the Chair, very clearly not only a provision which is not authorized by existing law but one which is directly contrary to existing law. The provision in this paragraph is for the expenses of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, for administrative purposes, miscellaneous adjustments, losses due to maintenance and operation of ships, for the tying up and reconditioning of ships, and the carrying out of the provisions of the merchant marine act.

Now we find ourselves confronted, as has been shown by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] in his reference to section 14, to which the attention of the Chair has been called, with the fact that the net proceeds derived by the board after July 1, 1922, must be applied to certain specific purposes or turned into the Treasury of the United States. The purposes stated are as follows:

Such net proceeds, less an amount to be authorized by Congress to be withheld as operating capital, less such sums as may be needed for insurance, etc., shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States as miscellaneous receipts; so that we have this direct and positive statement by existing law in the organic act creating this board, in which it is stated that for these specified purposes after July 1 those proceeds must be covered into the Treasury of the United States, unless they should be for the three purposes mentioned. These three purposes, and these three purposes only, may be reappropriated by Congress in an appropriation act or otherwise.

As I stated before, they must be only those three exceptions, and none other authorized by law; otherwise the provision is in contravention of law. It appears to the Chair clearly and inevitably that the point of order is well taken, for the reason which the Chair has stated, and the Chair so holds.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SEARS: Page 28, at the end of line 22, strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and insert "Provided further, That no part of any sum appropriated or made available in this act shall be used for advertising reflecting on the United States or for the purpose of inducing anyone to visit foreign countries for recreation in preference to summer or winter resorts in the United States."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Florida desire to modify his amendment, in view of the fact that all after line 12 has been stricken from the bill?

Mr. SEARS. Yes; I make that modification.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will change the amendment so that it will follow line 12 instead of line 22.

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, perhaps it is hopeless to expect this amendment to pass. A few days ago I addressed the House on the advertisements that were being sent out by the Shipping Board, saying, "You are tired of the old winter vacation grounds. Go to China. Go to Japan. Go to other countries." In those remarks I called attention to the fact that this was a discrimination against the United States, and that such advertisements should not be paid out of the taxes of the people, and that it was neither fair nor just to the cities and chambers of commerce and that they could not hope to compete against the Government. I do not object to legitimate advertisements. I have been in the game myself; but I do object to the Government taxing the people and then spending the money to tell them that there is nothing in America worth seeing; especially so when only a few years ago, I remember, we spent thousands of dollars in advertisements from one end of the land to the other—"See America first."

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS. I have only five minutes, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. I was going to suggest that of course it is a great deal cheaper to go to foreign resorts than it is to go to the gentleman's district. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEARS. In reply to that may I say that I had the pleasure of addressing some of my northern friends when they were in Florida a few winters ago, and I told them that while we got some of their money when they came to Florida, my experience was that when I went to Atlantic City they got back all the money that I got from them while they were down in Florida, so you see it is a 50–50 proposition, and besides we keep the money in the United States. In that speech, in my humble way, I referred to Maine, to New Jersey, to the mountain resorts of New York, and to California, and said that Florida could take care of herself. I am just in receipt of a letter from a friend of mine whose name I will not give, but who does not reside in my district, which reads as follows:

I leave out the first sentence, in reference to myself, for I am not seeking notoriety, but simple justice.

* * * * * * *

Florida has little chance in advertising against the millions behind the Federal Government—pretty rotten competition. Next we may have the Government going into the citrous industry on some newly discovered isle, and to make a profit on the venture spending a few millions of the people's money to exploit the proposition and to market the fruit.

I inclose a letter I received this morning. You can have it for your files and make what use you desire of it.

I am so disgusted with the manner in which the Shipping Board is using up pages of high-class magazines and newspapers to divert travel from the United States that I did not read the inclosed letter.

I have never been unfair, and I will not be unfair now. I have that letter before me, consisting of four typewritten pages, written by some high-priced man in the Shipping Board, whose name I will not give, because I have no fight to make with him. I will simply quote from that letter:

You desire to know "What will it profit the United States to build up the Shipping Board at the expense of the rest of the country?"

There is absolutely no desire on the part of the United States Shipping Board to build itself up at the expense of the taxpayers. * * *

There is no way to stop these American tourists who have decided upon a trip to foreign countries to forego this trip for a vacation in the United States, but the United States Shipping Board can use its powers to persuade these Americans to travel under their own flag, particularly when the American ships operating on the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans to-day compare in speed, luxury, and comfort with any foreign passenger liners now in service.

The Government owns these passenger liners, now being operated, with few exceptions, and as you will note by the inclosed newspaper release which I issued October 19, 1921, the sum of $900,000 which was appropriated by the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation to extensively advertise American passenger lines operating Government vessels is appropriated only tentatively, the expenditure of the amount to depend upon developments. * * *

This $900,000 is not to be expended in one lump sum, but it is to be expended monthly, provided the results warrant the continuation of said monthly expenditures. So far the results have warranted the appropriation. * * *

I know Florida personally, having traveled from one end of the State to the other, Mr. Peter O. Knight, Tampa, Fla., being one of my personal friends. But I think you will agree with me that the American tourist seldom visits the same scenes twice, in contradistinction to the American who has a summer or winter residence outside of his own home.

To the letter I replied—

To my mind this expenditure is unjust; can not be defended, and you can rest assured I have not finished with the matter.

Now, Mr. Chairman, evidently that gentleman did not know what he was writing about, because it has been my pleasure to visit the mountains of North Carolina four times, and I trust that next summer, if the majority leader is correct in his statement that we will get away from here about the first of June, I may go there the fifth time. I have had the pleasure of visiting Atlantic City three or four times, and I expect to go there next summer. I hope some day I may be able to go to Maine. I never yet have had the pleasure of going there. I have no desire to go out of the United States until I have seen the beautiful places in the United States first.

Mr. HERSEY. Has the gentleman ever visited Poland Springs, Me., in the winter?

Mr. SEARS. I have not.

Mr. HERSEY. It is one of the best winter resorts in the world. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEARS. Then the gentleman from Maine thoroughly agrees with me, and this amendment certainly should be adopted. This letter from this gentleman in the Shipping Board further says—

Florida has been extensively advertised, not only by her excellent chambers of commerce and her citizens, but by all those who have ever visited the State, either on pleasure or business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has expired.

Mr. SEARS. I ask an extension of five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We are trying to get through with this bill to-day. I hope the gentleman will extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. SEARS. I have only taken up five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman that his time be extended five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS. I sometimes wonder why we treat a matter like this with so much levity and so little seriousness. If the Shipping Board wishes to advertise that they have good ships, and that people when they go abroad should travel on those ships, neither Florida nor Maine will object; but I do say it is unfair, it is unwise, it is unjust to take the people's money to pay for advertisements that you should not go to Florida; that you should not go to Maine; that you should not go to California; or any other State in the Union, and thereby try to induce people to go to foreign countries. Nearly every day in the Washington papers appear pictures of scenes in Florida. I just happened to pick up the Washington Herald, and if my good friend, the chairman of this committee, will look at it, I think he will go to Florida, where, by the way, he owns large interests in land.

The picture may appeal to him. It is a picture of Jockey and Mrs. Clarence Kummer photographed on the beach at Miami, Fla., just a few days ago. This famous jockey rode Man o' War when he won the race recently, and I dare say if you will write him he will answer saying he will be back next winter. Florida can take care of herself, but as I said the other day, and I say again in all seriousness, if the Members of Congress are going to appropriate money for the Shipping Board or any other agency of the Government to advertise that there is nothing to see in Florida or that people are tired of going there, then the citizens of Florida might just as well quit spending their money in advertising in the papers that there is something in that great State of ours to see, and that our climatic and health conditions are not excelled by any country in the world. We can not compete with the Government, and as my good friend said in his letter to me, we are getting tired of such rotten stuff being sent out by the Shipping Board. The party who wrote me was formerly the editor of a paper and owner of a paper himself, and thoroughly knows the game.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, desiring to be fair, as I always try to be, I will state the advertisements to which I am objecting did not mention Florida any more than it did any other winter or summer resort. So I appeal to you and to the Shipping Board in all fairness to stop such advertisements for it can not hurt the Shipping Board in any way, shape, or form. I am not criticizing any member of the board. Those of you who have served with me for the past seven years know that I have not at any time criticized the administration of either party. If I have a complaint or reason to come before you which I think is sound, I come before you and present it. In my remarks the other day I left out Florida, but to-day I want to appeal in behalf of the people of my State, who are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars advertising the beauties, health, opportunities, and the climate, which to-day is 62 above there compared with 20 below here, to stop this discrimination and not compel us to compete with the Government. A fair deal—a square deal is all we ask for. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida [Mr. SEARS].

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. SEARS), there were 11 ayes and 41 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, at the end of line 12, insert: "Provided, That not more than $1,000,000 shall be expended by the United States Shipping Board or Emergency Fleet Corporation out of any sums appropriated in this act for the repair, reconditioning, or rebuilding of any one of such ships."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if any member of the committee knows any good reason why this amendment should not be adopted I, of course, am not particularly insistent upon it; but I think it very well for us to express the congressional opinion at least, so that the Shipping Board and the Emergency Fleet Corporation may know that we do not approve of the expenditure of large sums of money for the reconditioning or repairing of any ship of the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. There is no part of this appropriation set out here for the repair or reconditioning of any ship.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We all know that the Leviathan is the principal vessel involved in this amendment. I understand that they are going to enter into a contract, and it may be that this contract has already been made. But it occurs to me that the language of this section might make a part of the fund appropriated in this act available for the Leviathan, even though the contract was made now, because it says in line 8, "the amount on hand July 1, 1922," and then, second, "$50,000,000."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. They have already stated that they intended to recondition and repair the Leviathan.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. I call the chairman's attention to the fact that he is in error, because in the hearings they say they contemplated using a part of the funds appropriated in this bill, but by reason of their reconditioning the Leviathan they will be required to ask for a deficiency later.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not think there is any doubt but that if some of this money is on hand on July 1, the money covered by this act, they can use it for that purpose, and I do believe that, if we write this provision in here, very likely the responsible officials will pay a good deal of attention to it.

Mr. MANN. The item in the bill says for reconditioning and repairs.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; it says for the reconditioning and repair of ships.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Can the gentleman state what amount it is proposed to spend on the Leviathan?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In my opinion, from what I gather from the hearings, it varies; but all the way from six to eight million dollars.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Seven million dollars, I think, is the amount.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Here is the proposition. We have declared heretofore, as I understand it, in an act of Congress, that it is our judgment that we ought to get rid of the fleet as soon as we can reasonably do so, and put it into private hands. Do gentlemen think we are justified in spending large sums to recondition ships in view of that expression of the opinion of Congress. It may be that this will not do any good, but it will be a warning to the responsible officials what we believe should be done.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman proposes by his amendment to stop the reconditioning and repair of ships?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; but I propose to limit them to a million dollars for each ship.

Mr. EDMONDS. What would the gentleman do in case of a passenger ship which might cost $2,000,000 to repair or recondition?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I am glad the gentleman asked the question. I will tell him what I would do. I would tell these officials to come to the Appropriations Committee and have them report to us that they wanted an appropriation for that amount available for that particular ship. When they do that we have got our hands on the throttle, and if we do not do it they can spend it in any way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Suppose the ship is injured in some foreign sea and it costs more than $1,000,000 to repair or recondition her, what does the gentleman propose—to let some salvage company take it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Congress is always in session.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. We are all hoping that Congress will adjourn by June 1, and then it would not be in session from June until December next, and in that time such an accident might happen.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me ask the gentleman something. Does the gentleman think they ought to spend more than $1,000,000 on the fixing up of any ship, when we do not know and nobody knows whether we want that ship?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the United States Government, through the United States Shipping Board and the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation, is in the business of running ships. It is in a business enterprise, and I think that that business enterprise and the corporation which has that enterprise in hand should have a free hand to do what any business concern would find it necessary to do, to protect the property and the interests of the United States.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Ordinarily I have a very high estimation of my colleague's judgment, but as to this I shall have to differ with him. I think when it comes to an item of $1,000,000 or more that we are the persons who ought to and do have the responsibility. I think this will do no harm and ought to be incorporated in the bill for this purpose.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to take up any of the time of the committee, because I am very anxious to have the bill proceed to its conclusion, but I think the hour has come when we ought to take an inventory of our own attitude and see whether or not we are really in a position to say what must be done in a particular case without having any knowledge of the facts in the case. The war came on in 1917. We had no ships, and we had to raise a great Army. We were sending that Army abroad. We got them over there to the number of 2,000,000. It was found that we needed transportation facilities to save their lives and to provide them with their needs. The Congress liberally provided funds with which to buy or build ships. They did both. They undertook to operate them. We were all clamoring, every Member of Congress, Democrat and Republican, everyone in the United States, for speed. We all voted for every dollar with which to do the thing that we believed should be done to win the war. We won it. We had 420 ships completed when the war closed. We had 2,000,000 troops on the other side. We had to bring them back. The Shipping Board had a program. It was incomplete. The program was larger than perhaps it ought to be, but they conceived the opinion that the hour had come when America should enter the merchant marine business, and they built a good many ships, more than they had when the war closed. There has been a good deal said about the extravagant waste of money in connection with the construction of ships and with their operation, and we all admit that the cost of these ships is higher than it should have been. That, however, is passed. We have got the fleet. It cost the American people $3,300,000,000. When the war closed freights were high, and ship after ship was sailing the seas, carrying the commerce of the world. The ships were all employed while that condition lasted. We all hoped then that conditions would continue as they were. The slump came. Commerce ceased. The ships were tied to the docks everywhere in the world. American ships were no exception to the rule.

The United States, as a result of the war, has 10,000,000 deadweight tons of ships, 20 per cent of all of the ships of the world. Commerce is depressed. There is no tonnage for ships. Ships of every nation are tied to the docks, but we have a fleet. We are bound to lose money whether we operate them or not. The loss on the fleet that we built with which to conduct the war was last year $200,000,000, it is said. We charged the present Shipping Board with the responsibility of cutting the cost. When they came into power they had no facts. They had no facts when they came before the Congress last August, and without facts we gave them $48,500,000 with which to conduct this great enterprise.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. We charged them with the responsibility of cutting the costs. They promised to cut them. They have kept their promise. We charged them with the responsibility of ascertaining what the assets of the Shipping Board are. They found them. They found that we have assets of $306,000,000 of one kind and another, to say nothing about the ships themselves, and that we have liabilities of about $219,000,000, outside of the claims that are in the courts in suits. They found that if they are given the opportunity that within the next year they will be able to clean all of this situation up; they will pay the bills. They have reduced the loss from over $200,000,000 a year to $48,000,000 or $50,000,000 at most. They have but 400 ships in operation, it is true, but they have the same proportion of ships operating that every other shipowner has throughout the world. It costs $3,000,000 a month to tie these ships to the docks. That makes $36,000,000 of a loss every year. We are losing a million dollars a month on the ships that we are operating. If we tied them all up we would not lose any less than we are losing now.

We have the fleet and we have to protect it. It is the property of the American people. Of course, the time is coming, and it is not far off, when we must transfer this fleet into private hands, but we can not transfer it into private hands at present, because there is no sale for property of any kind, much less for ships. You can not charter ships. You can not get rates that will permit you to operate successfully, if you did charter them, and while this depressed condition prevails throughout the world, you can not expect the Shipping Board to bring in a balance sheet to show great profits. What are we going to do with the property? It belongs to you; it belongs to me; it belongs to every man, woman, and child in America. It is ours; we paid for it. What are you going to do with it? Are you going to throw it away; are you going to discard it? Are you going to say to the men who are charged with the responsibility of conducting and managing this problem that we will not permit them to manage it? Are you going to tie their hands so that they can not conduct the business? Do gentlemen realize that this is a bigger business than the business of the United States Steel Corporation? It is a business institution. Unfortunate for the American people, it is true, but we have it on our hands, and it is fortunate, after all, that we have it on our hands, for we got the benefit of the ships when we most needed the benefits. We were able to bring our troops back from abroad, and no such body of troops was ever brought with such expedition from any place in the world before, and we did it because we had the ships. I am not blaming anybody for the condition. We can not do that. The war was extraordinary. The conditions under which we are operating are extraordinary. If we had provided the means for the conduct of a war for a single year, we would not have so many ships.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. We would not have had so much money invested in those ships, but those who were in the control of the Government at that time, I assume, were trying to conduct a war that might last four or five years.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MADDEN. And so we have invested in ships that we constructed during the war with money that perhaps otherwise would not have been invested.

We are all Americans. We are all interested in the success of the Nation. We were all interested in the war. There was no politics then. You gentlemen on the Democratic side were supported loyally by every man on the Republican side when you had control. We did not raise any political question. Today we are in responsible control. Our duty is to clean up all the problems that confront us as far as we know how to do so. These are war problems. This is a war problem. We have certainly got to ask you to cooperate with us in cleaning this problem up, as we were expected to cooperate with you to win the war. The war is not over so far as these problems are concerned. It still continues. And the Shipping Board is one of the instrumentalities charged with the great problem that was created, not for the purpose for which it is conducted, but for the purpose of winning the war.

I appeal to you gentlemen, every one, to treat this question as a great business question would be treated; treat it fairly, and treat it with consideration. Do not try to tie the hands of those that we have employed to conduct this great business. Give them a chance. They are doing well. But it may be said that they complained about the operation of the M. O. 4 contract. I complained about it. I said then, and I continue to say, that the contract that is called the "managing operators'" contract, under which they received 5 per cent of the gross receipts, was, under the terms of the contract at the time it was made, unwise. I will put it that way, as modestly as I can. The present Shipping Board said it was a contract that never ought to have been made. They said they tried to modify it; tried to abrogate it. They come now and admit they can not abrogate it under the present conditions, but they have modified it. They say they have done away with the stevedore companies that these managing operators formerly organized. They have done away with the cost of subsistence for the men employed on the ships; that is, they have reduced the cost from $1.25 to 80 cents per day per man, and they propose when the conditions justify to abrogate the contract entirely. But they say, and say it truthfully, that there is no chance under the present depressed conditions to proceed except as they are going. We are losing $48,000,000 or $50,000,000 a year. They have reduced the cost of the overhead here in the management of this plant from $15,000,000 to $10,000,000. I have heard it complained in the discussions on the floor that they are employing high-priced attorneys. They are employing a few men to manage that draw exorbitant pay. They are employing a few men at great salaries, as we understand salaries in the Government service.

There are only six of them now; proposed to be 13 under this bill. What have they done? They have reduced the number of people engaged in the management of the Shipping Board from 8,000 and odd down to 5,000, and they have reduced the overhead cost from $15,000,000 a year to $10,000,000. Have they functioned? I think they have. If this bill is passed in its present form, without any restrictive limitations that will embarrass, I predict that at the end of the next year the Shipping Board will be able to make a report that will justify our action; that they will have paid up most of the claims that are pending against the Shipping Board, except those in court, out of the $50,000,000 we propose to appropriate. They will recondition such ships as they are planning to recondition; they will conduct the business on business lines, and they will justify the confidence of the Congress and of the American people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have a minute in which to answer a question.

Mr. LANGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that he may have two minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not want two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his colleague may have his time extended for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman believe that this Shipping Board ought to undertake the reconditioning of the Leviathan?

Mr. MADDEN. I will say in reply to that that the Shipping Board wanted to sell the Leviathan. They were offered $4,000,000 for it. They had it sold. They were enjoined in the courts of the country from selling the ship. It is costing $60,000 a month to maintain the ship at the dock, or $720,000 a year, or 9 per cent on $8,000,000. She is rotting. It is far better to recondition her at whatever reasonable cost can be justified than to continue her in the present shape.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Illinois pardon me for an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. One of the high-priced lawyers referred to is a Kentuckian, a former Solicitor General of the United States, the Hon. William Marshall Bullitt, one of the great lawyers of the South.

Mr. MADDEN. I do not care where he comes from. The only thing I am concerned in is that the board shall successfully function.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has made an informing and interesting statement. I submit, however, that his statement is not relevant to the pending amendment. The gentleman from Illinois must remember that he advised Congress less than six months ago to place limitations and restraints on the authority of the Shipping Board. The Shipping Board last year asked for an appropriation of $100,000,000, and the gentleman from Illinois rather boastfully told Congress that this amount had been denied them and that the committee only allowed $48,500,000. He further, in a speech before Congress, recommended the adoption of a limitation on the Shipping Board in the matter of employing attorneys and vested the Attorney General of the United States with authority to supervise and overlook the employment of attorneys by the Shipping Board and to fix the compensation to be paid such attorneys. He also offered an amendment limiting the Shipping Board to the employment of five men only at salaries in excess of the amount paid members of the board. Certainly, then, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is on record to the effect that it is not unwise and improvident to place limitations on the exercise of authority by the Shipping Board. The gentleman from Illinois did not answer the question of his colleague [Mr. GRAHAM], "Would you advise the expenditure of $8,200,000 on the reconditioning of the Leviathan, when it is stated that the chairman of the Shipping Board has expressed an opinion that if reconditioned it can not be sold for exceeding $6,000,000?" Congress announced in the act of 1920 that it was the policy of the Government to dispose of its ships to private parties.

The Government owns approximately 1,400 steel ships, 370 of which are now being operated. At the time the present Shipping Board took charge there were being operated over 600 ships, and they deserve credit for having reduced this number to less than 400, and it may be wise to encourage further reductions. Certainly, since we are reducing the number of ships in operation and are preparing to sell all ships now under the control of the Shipping Board, it is not unwise for Congress to direct that appropriations now carried shall not be expended in the further reconditioning and repair of ships where such cost will exceed $1,000,000. Let me give to the gentleman from Illinois my reasons for thinking that a limitation of this kind is not unwise, and I will pause to have him answer, if he holds a different opinion. The average steel ship we own does not exceed 10,000 tons. We have some ships larger and many smaller than this. Now, the evidence before the committee discloses that the ships we own, and which were constructed at a cost of more than $300 per ton, will probably be resold at from $30 to $40 per ton. This shows a large shrinkage in value, but it suggests at the same time the importance of limiting the amount that may be expended in the repair and reconditioning of these ships.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. I can not believe that the House will consider it unwise to place a reasonable limitation on the amount that can be expended in the reconditioning and repair of ships, especially since the Shipping Board has been authorized and directed to sell the ships at the earliest possible time when it can be done to the advantage of the Government. The officers of the Shipping Board have repeatedly called attention to the great loss that the Government must sustain in the resale of these ships.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. As to most of the reconditioning, where $1,000,000 would be spent, the ships are passenger vessels, and unquestionably they are worth more than $1,000,000.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman is correct, but he will recall that comparatively few of our passenger vessels need repairs, and we will soon have 19 additional new passenger vessels, which must be offered for sale to private parties at less than they originally cost. Some of these vessels have not yet been completed.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows that most of those 19 passenger vessels of the class that we are operating now are finished.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. The hearings disclose, however, that the Shipping Board will ask for an additional $12,000,000 to cover the cost of completing the remaining 19 ships. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] is quite familiar with the ships owned and the routes now established by the Shipping Board. I will ask him on what passenger vessels would he advise the expenditure of more than $1,000,000, unless it be the Leviathan?

Mr. EDMONDS. I myself am opposed to putting any money on the Leviathan.

Mr. OLIVER. I understood from a statement made some minutes ago that the gentleman was.

Mr. EDMONDS. It is possible that there may be some of the German vessels that can be used in European travel or in Mediterranean travel that can be repaired and reconditioned and operated profitably.

Mr. OLIVER. That does not answer my question. Will the gentleman advise that it is unwise to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], in which it is sought to fix a limitation on the authority of the Shipping Board to expend out of the appropriations carried in this bill a sum in excess of $1,000,000 in reconditioning and repairs of any single ship, and requiring that where a sum in excess of $1,000,000 is needed that a specific authority from Congress be first obtained? The Members of the House are responsible for the expending of public money, and I can not but feel, in the light of the facts disclosed in the hearings, that it is wise to place a limitation on sums to be expended in the repairs and reconditioning of vessels.

Mr. EDMONDS. I have no knowledge of any ship to-day that would require that expenditure.

Mr. OLIVER. I felt sure that the gentleman had no knowledge that would authorize an expenditure in excess of this sum, and I quite agreed with his statement made a short time since that he considered it unwise to spend $8,200,000 on the Leviathan, when it probably could not be resold if reconditioned for exceeding $6,000,000.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Does the gentleman know of any way to stop it if we do not do something of this kind?

Mr. OLIVER. None whatever. Let me remind the Members of the House that in 1920 Congress wrote into the permanent law a policy for the merchant marine which they felt would lend value to the ships owned by the Government, and which they directed should be operated for a limited time in establishing trade routes and then sold to private parties.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], as well as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], called especial attention in the committee's report, and also in speeches on the floor, to the fact that the bill of 1920 fixed a definite policy for the American merchant marine, and, if followed, would sustain the operation of American ships on a profitable basis and enable the Government to sell its ships to private parties on satisfactory terms. The policy I refer to was set out in sections 28 and 34 of the merchant marine bill passed in 1920. President Wilson was criticized for not putting sections 28 and 34 in force, and it is reported that President Harding—then Senator Harding—was one of the critics. After Mr. Harding went into office, however, he also failed to give force to sections 28 and 34, and it is now reported that he is opposed to the policy outlined in these sections and proposes to submit to Congress at some time in the future some form of direct subsidies in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HICKS). The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to be allowed to proceed for three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and his associate on the committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], have insistently advised Congress of the importance of sections 28 and 34 of the shipping bill of 1920 and have called attention to the fact that the enforcement of these sections will lend value to American ships and make it possible to maintain trade routes on a profitable basis. Now, since these sections have been ignored by the administrative officers of the Government, certainly no one can complain that limitations should be placed by Congress on the Shipping Board, not only as to the operation of ships but also as to amounts to be expended in repairs and reconditioning.

You must either require that the policy announced by Congress in 1920 be carried out or that the present administration submit some better substitute policy therefor. We can not afford to continue operating ships at a heavy loss. There could be no worse form of subsidy than the continuance of a policy that calls for the expenditure of $50,000,000 a year to cover deficits in the operation of these ships, and we owe it to the people of the country to see that a policy is announced, adopted, and followed that will insure the operation of ships on a paying basis, otherwise we should refuse to grant appropriations covering future losses.

I am interested in the building up of a merchant marine, but am unwilling to continue to operate ships in the absence of some well-defined policy which promises and insures the future operation of these ships on a sound business basis. It is doubtful whether Congress will vote a subsidy for the operation of ships, but if the administration persists in refusing to put in operation sections 28 and 34 of the bill of 1920 then Congress, before making further large appropriations for 1923, must require the administration to outline and submit for the consideration of Congress a definite policy in reference to our merchant marine. The papers report that the administration will recommend a system of subsidies, and it is important to know what the attitude of Congress will be in reference thereto, before large sums are placed at the disposal of the Shipping Board to continue the operation of ships, which, under present conditions, must result in great loss to the Government.

When Congress passed the bill in 1920 authorizing and directing the Shipping Board to establish trade routes and operate for a limited time some of the Government-owned ships on said routes we had the right to expect that the policy announced in sections 28 and 34 would be carried out by the administration, thereby placing such established routes on a profitable basis. We now have it in our power to require the administration to either put sections 28 and 34 into effect or to submit to Congress its recommendations in lieu thereof, so that prompt action can be taken thereon, and appropriations should be withheld for 1923 until Congress is assured that some definite policy will be hereafter followed by the Shipping Board in the future operation of ships. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which is now before the committee simply means that the Shipping Board shall not proceed with the reconditioning of the Leviathan at an expense of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. It can not apply to any other vessel, and it is the simplest, shortest, and most direct course to take with reference to that matter. No other vessel needs any such repairs, and even the Leviathan would not be able to expend half that amount if it were not for the fact that it was proposed to change it from a coal burner to an oil burner. Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, seems to indicate that by this amendment we are showing some lack of confidence in the Shipping Board. Why, in heaven's name, gentlemen, we are appropriating here in lump sum over $100,000,000 for the Shipping Board to do with as it pleases and handle as it pleases and expend as it pleases. If that is not showing confidence enough in the Shipping Board, I do not know how it can be done.

By this amendment we seek to put some small limitation on their activities. The gentleman says that we want to restrict them in the management of the business. This is purely a business proposition, and why should the Leviathan be reconditioned? Who has given a solitary reason before the committee for the expenditure of this enormous sum?

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield? I call the attention of the gentleman——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I can not yield. I am going to call attention to what the gentleman is evidently going to speak of. One man said he believed the vessel could be operated at a profit. How many have said to the contrary?

Mr. DICKINSON. Does the gentleman know who Mr. Powell is?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. He is no better qualified than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] who has studied shipping business very carefully. He says that the vessel can not be operated at a profit. I am not giving my opinion on this thing.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Did not the Director of the Budget say the same thing?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; the Director of the Budget said the same thing. As I said before, when the Germans could not operate the vessel at a profit, what reason can anyone give that we can operate it at a profit when it would cost twice as much as it cost the Germans; yes, I might safely say cost three times as much because they propose to turn the vessel into an oil burner, and the expense of fuel would greatly exceed that if it was a coal burner. The Shipping Board is like every other commission. There are times in their enthusiasm when they want to expand the work of their department beyond anything necessary. The gentleman from Illinois asked what we should do with the ship. One thing, we can keep it as a troop ship, and another suggestion, which is more appropriate, is that it might be turned into an airplane carrier and save us $20,000,000. Instead of that they expect to refit it as a passenger ship, change it over from a coal burner to an oil burner, restore the great baths that were in it and the great halls that were in it, and redecorate and regild it, and when they get through they will have nothing but a bill of expense of seven or eight million dollars.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the Shipping Board seems to be like an ordinary cur dog that everybody has a right to kick. I wish to call the attention of the committee to some facts with reference to this thing that I think should have a bearing without regard to our prejudices. I know the Shipping Board is in disrepute, but that is not the fault of the present administration. No matter what the facts are, we have the condition now that we have to deal with, and instead of trying to hamstring those who are trying to bring some settlement out of this chaotic condition we ought to try to be helpful with suggestions in place of what they propose to remedy if we disagree with them.

Of course, this amendment is aimed at reconditioning the Leviathan. If we are not desirous of reconditioning that vessel, the amendment should be adopted. On the other hand, if by its adoption we are going to prevent the reconditioning of the Leviathan, we ought at least to provide some means for its disposal. It is a source of constant and continuous expense; it is costing many hundreds of thousands of dollars a year tied up as it is, without any return. The Shipping Board tried to dispose of it and had an opportunity to dispose of it at a bid of $4,000,000, but they were prevented by an injunction suit, because, as alleged, they were sacrificing the best interests of the Government and wasting the money of the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I want to ask you, if it is not an unfair question, does the gentleman think it ought to be reconditioned for a passenger ship at an expense of from $6,000,000 to $8,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do; and I will tell the gentleman why. I entertain the same opinion as the gentleman from Illinois. Here is the situation, as it is presented to the committee, and I think it will appeal to any reasonable man. Some of the best men in this country are charged with the responsibility of administration of the Shipping Board, and it is fair to presume that they are interested in bringing about that which is for the best interests of the country, and, in addition, their own reputation is at stake. What do they show us? The reconditioning of the Leviathan will cost $8,200,000 in round numbers. I have before me, and I wish everybody might examine them, these specifications which have been prepared, showing the minuteness with which these people have entered into the matter and the scrutiny they have given it both for and against the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; the gentleman asked me a question and I am answering it. They say it will cost $8,200,000. They have attempted to show, and if the gentleman will read the hearings before the committee I think he will be convinced, that from the committee's viewpoint they know more about it than does the gentleman from Illinois and a good deal more than the gentleman from Iowa as to whether it is practical or impractical. Now, we must depend of necessity on somebody. If I employ some one to represent me on a given proposition I am going to charge him with the responsibility; when he gives me a report and a proposition I must of necessity rely upon his judgment of those things which I have charged him with. These gentlemen tell us that after investing the $8,200,000 in the reconditioning of the Leviathan and providing for the capacity of one-third of its possibility, after charging off 5 per cent depreciation and all other allowances, after allowing as its full life 13 years, when it ought to be 20, and will be, they tell us that it will bring a net earning to the United States Government of more than $800,000 a year. I am not going to oppose any prejudice of mine against the judgment of these men who have entered into this thing and who claim to know, by reason of facts presented, that that will be the return to the United States.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. When we come to place a value in the estimates of people as to what a ship will probably bring it is a very fair test to judge by what the ships we now have are bringing in, is it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the information before the committee does not bear out the hopes of these people as to the probable returns from the Leviathan.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It more than bears them out.

Mr. OLIVER. The statement is made that no ship line is now operating at a profit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman is mistaken there. The ships that are operating in carrying freight are operating at a loss, but in the north Atlantic passenger-carrying trade they are operating at a profit, and if one of you gentlemen to-day desires to get passage across upon any one of the first-class steamers now operating, you would have a great deal of trouble in getting it unless you applied a long way in advance. All those ships are operating at a profit. It is the purpose to recondition the Leviathan, to make it a first-class passenger-carrying vessel. There is no vessel in the world comparable with it. It is expected, if it is reconditioned, that it will become the great passenger-carrying vessel of the world, and there is a good deal of reason for that. There is more or less of pyschology and sentiment which enters into this thing, as into all the transactions of life. I do not know how many thousand boys went over upon this ship; I do not know how many thousand boys came back upon it; but to each one, coming or going, there is more or less sentiment. We know that there is more desire to go to Europe to-day than ever before, and that there is more desire to come from Europe over here to-day than ever before. That is why these vessels that are engaged in the north Atlantic passenger trade are operating at a profit while freight-carrying vessels are operating at a loss.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Of course, the gentleman from Indiana knows a great deal more about the Leviathan than I do, although I have been all over her and the gentleman has not. I would ask the gentleman where he finds the figures as to how much it is going to cost to operate the Leviathan, and where in the hearings he gets the comparisons with the cost of the operations of other vessels, where the figures are that these gentlemen estimate these big profits from?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I refer the gentleman to the hearings, at page 1129. I will ask him to mark that down so that he can investigate for himself.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have seen that page, and it is not there.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Then the gentleman is past understanding, so that I am not prepared, either by argument, persuasion, or otherwise to convince him. The gentleman from Iowa, who knows nothing about this transaction, is trying for some purpose, I know not what, to assert himself against the men who are supposed to know something about this business. He knows no more about it than I do, and I know nothing more about it, except as I have been convinced by the gentlemen in whom we should have confidence. I know it is an easy matter for demagogues and those who are speaking back to their States to say, "I have done this, or that, to try to save you some money." The gentleman from Iowa, of course, would not be guilty of any such thing as that, but I want to say to you that it is time for us to rise to the importance of this matter, because in it much more is involved than the return of either the gentleman from Iowa or myself. Upon its determination and the policies that may be adopted depends the fate of the merchant marine of the United States. We have heard much in the past with reference to the fact that it involves too much expenditure to establish a merchant marine, because we have not had the ships. We can no longer offer that excuse. We have the ships, and it remains now for us to determine whether we will utilize the present opportunity and employ the ships we have or whether we shall sink back again into the obscurity which we have occupied since the close of the Civil War, seeing the American flag each month disappear from the seas, until we became an object of contempt rather than an object of admiration on the ocean. It is time for us to get away from these bickerings, whether it appeals to you as a Democrat or a Republican. It should appeal to us as Americans, with respect to the policy that we are to adopt, as to whether or not we are to have a merchant marine.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I have not the time. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois be adopted, it would be very harmful. The Leviathan to-day is costing $750,000 a year to maintain it in absolute idleness. What are you going to do with it?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman want me to tell him?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We have some very capable Committees on Naval Affairs and the Merchant Marine and Fisheries that could probably suggest a remedy, but, so far as I am concerned, before I would ask to have a ship reconditioned at an expense of $8,200,000, which would be worth only $6,000,000 when I got through, I would take it out and sink it, and I would be the winner by $2,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we are very anxious to get this bill through, but the gentleman is speaking so interestingly that I shall not object.

Mr. HERRICK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman answer me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HERRICK. I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that just prior to the outbreak of the European war there was a great roar going up and down the country for a ship subsidy in order to acquire a merchant marine, and is there any difference, except in name, between losing a great amount of money on the merchant marine that we have now and granting a subsidy, if the European war had not occurred.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think that is a most intelligent question, and I am free to say that the gentleman is absolutely correct. There never will be established a merchant marine in this country unless we have some kind of a subsidy for it. Do not make any mistake about that. There has never been one established heretofore without a subsidy. We had it when the American vessels were the pride of the sea. We lost it when we withdrew that support. And it remains for the American people to say whether or not we are going to have it now.

I want to call your attention to this fact: We have a conference down here that is trying to provide some scheme for the limitation of armament, trying to bring about a better understanding among the nations of the earth, trying, if you please, to establish the brotherhood of man. How can it better be done than to have the American flag go into every port on the face of the earth? How can it better be accomplished than through the possibilities that we have now in making it possible for the traditions of a free people and their accomplishment to be carried through our trade relations to the people of the earth? We have never had a better opportunity than we have now, and it is ill becoming men who aspire to be statesmen to let their little local prejudices and the possibility for support, either for or against this institution, influence them on this important question. So I say to you gentlemen here that this amendment is far-reaching in its effect, further than it pretends to be upon its face. I know the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] is not desirous of shifting the responsibility for the establishment of the American merchant marine.

I know it is not his purpose to try to do anything that will hinder the attempt of those now in charge of the administrative affairs, not only of the Shipping Board but of the whole policy of this Nation, to bring something of accomplishment out of this chaotic condition that we have found. I hope that it will appeal to his reason and the reason of the gentlemen here, after reviewing all the evidence in this case, that now of all other times we should do that which we think is best for the future of this country. I know it appears on its face that we are extravagant in this expenditure. I will admit it. These salaries seem extravagant. All of this expenditure seems extravagant, but this is an extravagant business. It was created in extravagance and out of the extravagance due to the waste of war. It will be extravagant until we can bring some order out of the chaotic condition that we have found, for which we are not responsible and for which the agency and emergency of war was responsible. So let us be now as patriotic as we were then. We then simply opened the Treasury of the United States to build ships and more ships. We have built them, and we have them now. Are we going to waste them? Let us exercise some care over the possessions we have, that they may redound to the good not only of the future of this country but of the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Page 28, after line 12, insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"Of the sums appropriated in this act, not more than $400,000 shall be used for advertising purposes."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9981 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6119. An act to authorize the coinage of a Grant memorial gold dollar and a Grant memorial silver half dollar in commemoration of the centenary of the birth of Gen. Ulysses S. Grant, late President of the United States.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 56 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, January 28, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

489. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a tentative draft of a paragraph to be added to House bill 7864, increasing the limit of cost of certain scout cruisers; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

490. A letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a draft of a bill authorizing the acquisition of certain sites for naval aviation stations; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 28, 1922.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 25, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Hale	McNary	Swanson
Brandegee	Harris	Moses	Townsend
Cameron	Heflin	Nelson	Wadsworth
Capper	Johnson	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Caraway	Jones, Wash.	Page	Warren
Cummins	Kellogg	Pepper	Watson, Ga.
Curtis	Keyes	Phipps	Watson, Ind.
Ernst	La Follette	Poindexter	Weller
Fernald	Lenroot	Ransdell	Willis
Fletcher	Lodge	Sheppard
France	McCumber	Spencer
Gooding	McKinley	Sterling

Mr. MCNARY. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. LADD] on official business.

Mr. RANSDELL. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BROUSSARD], on account of illness in his family.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The reading clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. LADD answered to his name when called.

The following Senators entered the Chamber and answered to their names:

Ball	Frelinghuysen	Hitchcock	Oddie
Calder	Glass	Jones, N. Mex.	Sutherland
Culberson	Harreld	McKellar	Walsh, Mass.
Dial

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on business of the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, on several occasions during the last few days the learned Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] has argued that the pending bill, for the funding of what is commonly called the foreign debt, is unconstitutional. That is a very novel and very interesting suggestion. Coming from a lawyer of the distinction of the Senator from Montana, of course it attracts attention and is entitled to consideration. I do not think that it is of great practical importance, so far as the consideration of the bill is concerned, because I doubt very much whether any considerable number of Senators will take that view of the pending measure.

It is of very great importance, however, on account of the underlying principles upon which the contention is based. It is a revival of the doctrine that Congress has nothing to do with foreign affairs, and that the exclusive jurisdiction over the foreign policies of the country is vested in the President of the United States, acting by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

That was a great national issue in some of its phases in the political campaign of 1918. At that time the then President of the United States appealed to the voters of the country to elect a Congress which would support his views and his policies, so that he might be, as he expressed it, as I recollect, the unembarrassed spokesman for the Nation in affairs at home and abroad.

That strikes me as a dangerous and fundamental fallacy in the principles of our Government. There is no doubt whatever in my mind that Congress has as much jurisdiction over the foreign affairs of the country as it has over its domestic affairs, and that the jurisdiction and authority of the President of the United States in dealing with foreign nations is limited by law; that Congress has a right to fix a limitation upon his conduct of foreign affairs; that only in so far as Congress does not act—under the treaty power of the Constitution—the President may act.

It is somewhat similar to the control of Congress over interstate commerce. It has been held many times by the courts that in that indistinct zone of conflict between the States and National authorities the States may act where Congress has not exercised its authority, but at any time that Congress, exercising its powers under the Constitution, sees fit to assume its jurisdiction, whatever action it takes supersedes that of the States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I wish to repeat, if I may, the words used by the Senator. I am quite sure he does not mean what I think the ordinary person upon reading his words, if he allows them to stand as they are, would think he meant.

The Senator, as I recall his words, just stated that in dealing with foreign nations, in so far as Congress did not act, the President had authority to act. The Senator does not mean that the President may make a contract with a foreign sovereignty, so as to bind the people of this country, simply because Congress has not taken up the matter?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly he can, within the constitutional limitations. There are certain limitations fixed by the Constitution. Of course, in all cases I imply that he must act with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, the Senator admits that the President of the United States has authority, under the Constitution, to make treaties, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, two-thirds of the Senate voting therefor. Aside from his right, in the exercise of his constitutional power to negotiate treaties, the Senator does not mean that he has a right to bind the country by a personal agreement between himself and the Government of another sovereignty?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If there is any doubt left in the mind of anyone by the remarks which I made and the implication could be drawn from them that I advocated the doctrine that the President alone could bind the country, I am very glad the Senator from Connecticut has called attention to that fact.

I have known of many agreements made between the executive department of our Government and foreign nations which I reprobated very emphatically because of the fact that they were done without constitutional authority, not having the advice and consent of the Senate. One of them to which I might call attention, which comes to my mind particularly, and which has been quite famous in recent years, is the Lansing-Ishii agreement. I do not think any such agreement as that has any binding effect upon this Nation at all. I think I said in the beginning of my remarks that the action of the President must be with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If he is making a treaty.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But the reason I called the attention of the Senator to what I thought might be the subject of misinterpretation of the casual phrase that he used was this: I had occasion the other day, Mr. President, to give my views upon the same subject that the Senator from Washington is now discussing, and I find that some of the press have entirely mistaken my position and misinterpreted my remarks, and have written learned and lengthy editorials on the theory that I had denied the power of the President to initiate the making of a treaty or to negotiate one, and that the Senate was now asserting its authority to prevent the President from even attempting to negotiate a treaty without first obtaining the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Of course, anyone who knows the Senator from Connecticut knows he is too good a lawyer to advocate any such idea as that. I understood him perfectly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am too good a lawyer, though not a very good one, to have misinterpreted the Senator's position, but I am cautioning him to be very careful what he says or he will be misinterpreted by certain learned newspapers all over the country.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have become quite accustomed to that experience.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] a question before he takes his seat. Just what position does such an agreement as the Lansing-Ishii or the Root-Takahira agreement occupy in our international affairs?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Idaho, I think, probably entertains the same view that I do about that, and he probably knows what view I entertain, but wishes me to state it publicly, which I am very happy to do. That same question was asked Secretary of State Lansing, if I remember it, when we had him as a witness before the Foreign Relations Committee, and, if I recall his answer correctly, he admitted that that agreement had no binding force upon the country whatever; that it was simply an understanding between the State Departments of the two countries affected; and if questioned by the constitutional authorities of the country, it would not stand for a minute. No agreement made by our Secretary of State with a minister of foreign affairs of a foreign power, or no agreement made by the President of the United States with any foreign chief executive, would bind this country, no matter whether or not it would bind the foreign country, without the consent of the Government of this country; and the Government of this country does not consist of the President, nor of the Senate, nor of the Congress as a whole; but many newspaper writers and other learned gentlemen when they read the expression "the government of the country" seem to think that the King is the Government of Great Britain and that the President is the Government of the United States. No such delusion, I am sure, exists in the minds of the people at large.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not the floor.

Mr. BORAH. I want to ask the Senator from Connecticut one more question leading up to the thought I had in mind. We have lately negotiated a treaty which is known as the "four-power treaty," but which may more properly be called the "four-power alliance." Since that treaty was negotiated there has arisen a misunderstanding as to what it means. The Secretary of State and the proper official in Japan are now about to exchange notes, I understand, to delimit the meaning or scope of that treaty. Now, can the Secretary of State alone, by a mere exchange of notes, change the plain terms of the treaty so as to make it speak other than it does according to its terms?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I have never looked up that question or attempted to do so, because it never has become a practical one in my experience, but I should assume that such interchange of notes, while not being absolutely legally binding upon the respective countries, yet when they were exchanged, if the constitutional authorities of the country who are capable of modifying did not express another view or did not protest against that interpretation, it would stand, in the same way as I think it would be binding upon a foreign power with which we had made a treaty or negotiated a treaty if the Senate attached to it a reservation, stating that it was the understanding of the United States that the treaty meant so-and-so, and the other power, although they knew about it and were notified of it, did not protest against it, but maintained silence. I think the construction of that act on their part would be that they had assented to it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the entire question in dispute between the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Connecticut is rather apart from the proposition which I am discussing, which is the comparative jurisdiction of the treaty-making branch of the Government and Congress as a whole. I entirely agree with the suggestions which have been made by both Senators with regard to the effect of the so-called Executive agreements. I think they have done a great deal of harm, because they are accepted by foreign nations as binding the United States when they have not received constitutional sanction, and consequently they lead to misunderstanding and have been exceedingly embarrassing.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Georgia desire to interrupt me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield first to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I was going to ask the Senator from Washington whether or not foreign Governments should not be presumed conclusively to know what our Constitution and form of government are?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Undoubtedly; I agree with the Senator from Georgia as to that; but while they are presumed to know that, sometimes, as a matter of fact, they appear not to fully realize it. Therein is the vice of the Executive branch of the Government undertaking to represent the country without the advice and consent of the Senate, which is required under the Constitution. Now, I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question, because, undoubtedly, he has given a great deal of consideration to the question of the extent to which the President of the United States may bind the Government without a formal treaty. If I remember rightly, we settled the question of indemnity following the Boxer rebellion without any treaty; the matter went no further, as I now recall, than a mere protocol, as it was called, between the nations; and China issued her bonds to the United States for something over $24,000,000 in accordance with that protocol. I thought it might now be an appropriate time, while the Senator from Connecticut is discussing the subject, to have his opinion with reference to the binding effect of the protocol and the indemnity obligation which we received from China under it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I can not yield sufficient time to discuss in detail a protocol with China growing out of the Boxer rebellion. If the Senator from Connecticut, however, desires to make a brief reply I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I regret that I am unable to discuss that matter by the card. I have not the protocol before me; it is a matter that happened before I became a Member of Congress, and I do not remember the facts. I remember that the indemnity, or a part of it at least, was subsequently forgiven by this Nation, but whether it was done by an act of Congress——

Mr. McCUMBER. It was done by an act of Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Or whether there was a treaty about it, I do not remember. So that my answer to the Senator would be of no value to anybody, and I could not give him a positive answer.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, in the very beginning of my remarks I stated the principle which I desire to discuss, and that was, on the one hand, the question of the power of the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to bind the country in our foreign affairs in contracts or agreements or treaties with foreign nations, and, on the other hand, the jurisdiction of Congress, as to both branches of Congress being required to concur in dealing with the same matter.

As I understand the argument of the distinguished Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], he divides the foreign affairs of the country and its domestic affairs in this respect into two distinct and completely separated branches of legislative action, and contends that those matters which are subject to treaty and which can be acted upon by the President and the Senate can not be acted upon by Congress. The Senator makes the statement that the House of Representatives, as a branch of Congress, has nothing whatever to do with a contract with a foreign Government. Mr. President, as a matter of constitutional law and as a matter of government, I dispute that proposition. I read from the remarks of the Senator from Montana, at page 1906 of the RECORD of January 25, as follows:

> The House of Representatives has absolutely nothing whatever to do with the making of a contract with a foreign Government, nor can power be delegated by it to any commission or body created by it.

On page 1908 of the RECORD he says:

> The President of the United States * * * is charged with the whole power and duty of taking care of our foreign relations.

I assume, of course, that he means with the advice and consent of the Senate. That is the proposition which I am discussing and which I am disputing. It is that proposition which I say is subject to the limitation that Congress, within its sphere of jurisdiction, may act in regard to those matters which involve our foreign relations concerning which the President may exercise his Executive authority, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and subject to the authority of Congress. It is possible that he may supersede an act of Congress with the advice and consent of the Senate, but Congress likewise may supersede him and the treaty which is made under the proper constitutional procedure, thereby demonstrating the fact that it, at least, has coordinate jurisdiction over those matters.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption there?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I find myself utterly unable to follow the argument of the Senator from Washington. If we consummate a treaty with China under which Chinese are permitted to enter this country, the honor of the Government is pledged to abide by that treaty. So long as it remains in that form all the courts of the United States take cognizance of it; a Chinaman is entitled to come into this country, and no officer may deny him the right to enter; but Congress, in disregard of the treaty, passes a law—it does not make any contract with China at all, but it passes a law—prohibiting the entrance of Chinamen into this country. Now, the officers are obliged to observe the act of Congress and not the treaty, and in that sense the law supersedes the treaty.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the fact that Congress is permitted to enact such a law does not demonstrate in any way whatever that Congress is empowered to make a treaty with China by appointing commissioners to negotiate it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We have by virtue of the treaty with China a contract with China, and when Congress passes a law which supersedes it it has something to do with the contract with China. The argument of the Senator from Montana, by which he undertakes to show by some process of reasoning that by such a law Congress does not deal with the contract with China, is rather sublimated and superrefined, it seems to me.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator now clearly understands my position, if he did not understand it before. There was no opportunity for mistaking it before, and I do not think there is now; but I think the Senator understands my position now.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes; I understand the Senator's position, but I do not agree with the Senator's conclusion. The Senator further stated:

> So, conceding now, as it is conceded, that this matter does fall within the treaty-making power, if it likewise falls within the legislative power, the President of the United States may be robbed of his aboslute veto in relation to a matter of agreement with a foreign power.
> But there is another view, Mr. President, and that is that it does not fall within the legislative power at all; it is not legislation. The question of the treaty-making power had some little consideration from Alexander Hamilton at the time the Constitution was before the country for ratification, and he laid down the doctrine, which I think has never been controverted, that the legislative power deals with domestic matters exclusively.

I do not think that Alexander Hamilton ever laid down any such doctrine as that, and if he did, of course, it is a position that has been controverted by the experience and practice of the Government for 143 years, because the Congress constantly deals with matters that are not entirely domestic matters, of which the Senator from Montana himself has just given one instance, in which an act of Congress superseded and practically invalidated a treaty between the United States and China. Many other instances may be cited, some of which I will proceed to note in a few moments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In that matter, Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States repeatedly has determined that the Chinese exclusion act and other acts of similar character are domestic legislation; they deal with the internal affairs of the country; they have no force beyond the country; they simply provide that Chinamen shall not enter the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has just stated that the act of Congress superseded a treaty of the United States so far as the United States is concerned, and consequently it is not exclusively a domestic matter, because it affects our relations with a foreign country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator will have to war with the Supreme Court and not with me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Oh, no; I have no war with the Supreme Court on that question at all; I have no war with anybody on it. I am just calling attention to the contradiction between the Senator's statement and the case which he has cited.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me one moment, I will be very brief. Of course, both a treaty and an act of Congress are the supreme law of the United States. If a treaty is consummated Congress may later by an act denounce the treaty, or it may, as the Senator from Montana has suggested, enact a statute applying only to our domestic conditions preventing people, for instance, from coming into this country whom the treaty authorized to come in. That, of course, practically destroys the effect of the treaty, but it does not destroy the treaty itself; the treaty remains; it has not been denounced. We have passed legislation which really destroys the effect of the treaty, but the legislation we have passed on the subject, being the supreme law of the land and of equal authority with the treaty, and having been enacted at a later date, is assumed and held by the Supreme Court to be the controlling law in this country.

I want to say one other word, if the Senator will yield further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will pardon me, he will admit, then, and I assume the Senator from Montana will likewise admit, that the statute deals with the same subject matter with which the treaty deals. The treaty deals with a foreign question. Then the statute dealing with the same subject matter must likewise deal with a foreign question, and affect the relations of China with the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A great many domestic statutes may affect our foreign relations. A tariff bill may seriously affect our foreign relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Nevertheless, it is only a domestic law. I want to say one word to the Senator from North Dakota, if the Senator from Washington will give me the courtesy of doing so.

Without being at all positive as to how our right to indemnity from China accrued after the Boxer uprising was put down, the Senator will remember that we first forgave China the obligation of paying the interest on the indemnity, and then we forgave them most of the indemnity; and it was only a few weeks ago, I think the Senator will remember, that the matter was before the Foreign Relations Committee, and they reported to the Senate a joint resolution, to which the Senate agreed, which forgave the Chinese the rest of the indemnity which was due, $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. So that it was not by an Executive order or by an act of the President that that debt of China to the United States was forgiven. The President did not presume to handle it. I am quite sure he would not claim that he had any authority to forgive debts owed by foreign Governments to this Government; and the joint resolution that was passed by the Senate authorizing the forgiveness of this debt is now pending in the House, as I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have the act right here, and it is clear that what we did was done as an act of Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Montana goes still further than that, as I read his argument, and argues that Congress has no right to deal with foreign relations by the enactment of reciprocal legislation; that is, that some reciprocal engagement between the two countries may not be accomplished by the enactment of legislation simultaneously of a similar character separately in the two countries. He says, upon that subject:

> Now, I desire to comment on what the Senator has said. The Senator said that exactly the same result which can be attained by a treaty can be attained by cooperative legislative acts of the two Governments concerned. I am astonished to hear such sentiments avowed by so able a lawyer as the Senator from North Dakota.
> The Senator from North Dakota proposes that under those circumstances he would suggest to the foreign Governments that the parliament and Government of that country pass a certain law in substance the same as the treaty contemplated, and he will get the same law passed through the Congress of the United States by a majority of both Houses, and therefore he will beat the Constitution in that way. That is the contention made by the Senator from North Dakota. I deny, Mr. President, that the treaty-making power confided by the Constitution of the United States in the President and two-thirds of the Senate can be contravened by any such device as that.

The Senator from Montana admits, as he has just cited a case in support, that such questions as that are within the jurisdiction of Congress. Congress may enact legislation in regard to them, and he claims that the legislation is purely domestic when it does so; but if a foreign country sees fit, in the conduct of its affairs, to pass a similar statute by which reciprocal relations will be established between the two countries in regard to the subject matter of controversy, the Senator from Montana gives no reason whatever why both of them can not go into effect, each of them being within the jurisdiction of the legislative bodies of the two countries. I may cite an instance, Mr. President, of recent occurrence—the reciprocity proposal between Canada and the United States, which the Senator very well recollects. We passed a statute providing certain reciprocal tariff duties as affecting imports from Canada, and the same matter was submitted by the Canadian Government in a referendum to the Canadian people, and was there defeated. If it had been indorsed by the people of Canada it would have gone into effect as the result of reciprocal legislation by the two countries separately, which the Senator says here, in his answer to the Senator from North Dakota, can not be done.

Mr. President, one of the essential and peculiar functions of the House of Representatives is to deal with the money affairs of the Nation. The Constitution of the United States requires that revenue bills shall originate there, and by a parity of reasoning the practice has been that appropriation bills shall originate there; and while there are many things which may be dealt with by treaty—such, for instance, as customs duties of the United States—it has often been held by the courts that on account of the jurisdiction of Congress over those matters treaties dealing with such subjects and affecting the finances of the Nation do not go into effect and can not be executed until they have the approval of Congress, including the House of Representatives, by the necessary legislation. There are many cases to that effect. By the express terms of the Constitution Congress is vested with the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States."

Mr. President, the making of a treaty and its execution are quite different things. Many treaties are made which can not be executed until there is legislation by Congress.

If Congress can give effect to a treaty by legislation post factum, as it might be called, it can likewise give effect to a treaty by legislation enacted in advance; and that is essentially what this refunding bill is. Instead of waiting until the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, has made some arrangement with our foreign debtors and submitted it to Congress for its ratification, Congress undertakes by this legislation to authorize the limitations and the conditions under which these obligations can be refunded in advance of the action of the President. The Senator from Montana has failed to point out any principle or make any argument, so far as I have been able to get from his remarks upon this subject, to substantiate a claim that if Congress can act upon this matter after the treaty is made it can not likewise act upon it before the treaty is made and establish the terms and conditions of a prospective settlement.

It may be that the President can ignore that. I do not know whether he can or not, constitutionally. It is not necessary to discuss it. Of course, he will not. No President, in the face of an act of Congress fixing, to some extent, at least, the specific terms under which this refunding measure shall be carried out, would undertake of his own authority, in defiance of the act of Congress, to fix other and different terms. But suppose the President chose to do so. He might do so, perhaps, under the doctrine of the coordinate jurisdiction of the treaty-making branch of the Government and the Congress; and then it would remain to be determined whether or not Congress would pass the necessary legislation for carrying it into effect or would by a subsequent act nullify the agreement made by the President in defiance of its previous legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon an interruption——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I shall be glad to give the Senator an instance in which Congress was found unable to act before a treaty was negotiated, and was justified in acting thereafter.

Congress passed what was known as the migratory bird law, which was held to be unconstitutional, Congress having no power to legislate in the matter at all. Thereafter a treaty was entered into with Great Britain dealing with the subject, and Congress passed an act to carry out the provisions of the treaty, which was held to be valid and was sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That was a very different matter——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; it was not.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment; let me answer what the Senator has just said. That was a very different matter, because the court was unable to find jurisdiction in the Constitution for Congress to deal with migratory birds; but there is not any doubt about the jurisdiction of Congress to deal with the bonds and obligations of the Nation.

The President—it seems to be necessary to qualify that very particularly by stating "with the advice and consent of the Senate"—might make a treaty with some foreign country that under certain contingencies we could supply a certain amount of money to that country to carry on a military campaign of a certain nature described in the treaty; but that treaty would have no effect whatever unless, after it was made, Congress appropriated the money for carrying out its terms. So, the President might make a treaty with a foreign country that under certain contingencies he could furnish certain troops to cooperate with the troops of that country in a certain military expedition defined in the treaty. It would be a valid treaty; it would be binding upon the Nation; but it would have no effect, so far as its execution was concerned, unless it was subsequently ratified by Congress under the provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the authority to raise and support armies. So I might go on at great length, pointing out the difference between the mere making of a treaty and its execution; and while it has been admitted here by a number of Senators that if the President saw fit, and secured the necessary two-thirds vote of the Senate, he might accomplish the purposes of this bill without the action of Congress, I think that is exceedingly doubtful. If it were the case, if he should have that authority, I contend that that does not in any way whatever contravene the jurisdiction of Congress, of its coordinate authority, to act upon the matter; but it seems to me that by reason of the fact that it deals with the finances of the Nation, it deals with the money of the Nation, it affects the taxes of the people, it is very doubtful whether the deferment, or, perhaps we might say for the sake of argument, the cancellation, of this vast amount of property of the people, aggregating over $9,000,000,000, could be effectuated by the President even with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senate without ratification by an act of Congress in which the House of Representatives, as more directly in touch with the people who pay the taxes, had concurred.

The President, as I said before, may make a treaty in regard to the customs duties of the Nation, but it has been held in several cases that that treaty is of no effect until the necessary tariff laws shall have been enacted by Congress in pursuance of its terms. So it seems to me quite astonishing, on this particular subject, which deals with the property, the finances, the resources of the people, that the Senator not only contends that it is not proper to undertake a settlement by way of an act of Congress, but even goes to the extent of saying that Congress has no jurisdiction to deal with it. It seems to me it is peculiarly a matter within the jurisdiction of Congress.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. Congress had jurisdiction originally, had it not, to provide that these loans might be made to the foreign Governments?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It certainly had.

Mr. STERLING. And the making of the loans involved an agreement between this country and the foreign Governments to which they were made. Is not that true?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is certainly true.

Mr. STERLING. And that agreement was made without the Senate having ratified it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is true.

Mr. STERLING. Now, does it not seem reasonable that Congress might provide for the refunding of these debts by the Executive without the ratification of an agreement for refunding by the Senate?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think so. I think it seems entirely reasonable and proper, as long as Congress lays down the terms and conditions under which it is to be done.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from South Dakota—a very able lawyer—was not here when the feature which he has now presented by his questions to the Senator from Washington was under consideration. The Senator from Washington quite naturally agrees fully with the views evidently entertained by the Senator from South Dakota; but those of us who are questioning the power now asserted advance the proposition, first, that those loans were made in pursuance of the power of Congress as a war measure, and secondly, that they were made in pursuance of the power of the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army. There can be no doubt at all that the Commander in Chief of the Army has the right to sell supplies and other property of the Government to a foreign power allied with us in the prosecution of the war, and he has the power to buy from them; and, of course, if he has the money available by virtue of any kind of an appropriation of Congress, he may loan the Allies money, and he may possibly even borrow money from them. The President of the United States, in time of war, as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and the Congress of the United States, have vast powers that the Congress can not exercise in time of peace, and that the President of the United States can not exercise in time of peace.

The Senator from South Dakota might possibly reflect upon those views, and I trust in doing so he will feel that the matter is not quite so clear as his question might seem to imply.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I know that the argument is made that what was done in making these loans to foreign powers was in pursuance of the war power of Congress and of the President as Commander in Chief. Assume that the loans were made in pursuance of such power; that does not go to say that they could not have been authorized by Congress independently of the war power of Congress and then executed by the President without a treaty. They were agreements of such a nature that they might, in my judgment, be made without ratification on the part of the Senate.

If the Senator will excuse me further——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Briefly, I will.

Mr. STERLING. I will defer what I was about to say. I may have a word to say later. I am interrupting the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Montana, as I understand, contends that this bill, among other things, is unconstitutional because it provides for the appointment of officers to carry on foreign negotiations. Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States, in defining the duties of the President, declares that:

> He shall nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The Senator will note in Thirtieth Statutes at Large, at page 1117, an appropriation for what is called the Canadian Commission. I think it is a commission sometimes called the Boundary Waters Commission. I find this language used in that statute:

> The said commission is also continued during said fiscal year—

The year for which the appropriation was made.

I have not undertaken to make an exhaustive survey of the statutes, but there is a very clear and specific act of Congress establishing, or at least continuing in power for the fiscal year, a commission appointed to deal with a foreign country in regard to international matters. It would be a very unfortunate, not to say tragic, thing if this commission to which I have just referred, which has afforded its genial refuge for so many of our unfortunate colleagues, ducks who wobble but are not entirely dead, should, by virture of the activities of the Senator from Montana, be held to be entirely unconstitutional and to have no valid existence.

Another case, which is one of very common occurrence, is the raising of foreign representatives from the rank of minister to that of ambassador. It is always referred to Congress. One of the reasons why it is referred to Congress is because the necessary expenses for the maintenance of the establishment must be provided by Congress. We constantly deal with the question of the erection of buildings for the accommodation of our foreign representatives, and many instances might be cited of various character in which Congress deals with the foreign affairs of the country in their various phases.

Mr. President, I wish to cite briefly a few other authorities. In the great fisheries dispute, the northeastern fisheries dispute, which lasted for about 100 years and almost led to war on several occasions between Great Britain and the United States, involving the respective rights of American citizens and British citizens to fish on the banks of Newfoundland and the other grounds covered by the so-called northeastern fisheries in the Atlantic Ocean. In Larned's History, volume 2, page 1152, there is a reference to the enactment of legislation by Congress dealing with that quarrel and dispute which governed the action of the President—by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, I had better add, for fear of being misunderstood—in dealing with Great Britain about that subject of international dispute involving proprietary interests of pecuniary and financial value to the citizens of the respective countries. The author says, on page 1152—and I read this because I have not had time to go back into the dusty archives and dig out the original acts of Congress:

> On the 1st of July, 1883, "in pursuance of instructions from Congress"—

That is a significant expression, "in pursuance of instructions from Congress"—

> the President gave the required notice of the desire of the United States to terminate the fishery articles of the treaty of Washington, which consequently came to an end the 1st of July, 1885.

Yet the Senator from Montana says Congress can not deal with foreign nations.

> The termination of the treaty fell in the midst of the fishing season, and at the suggestion of the British minister Secretary Bayard entered into a temporary arrangement whereby the American fishermen were allowed the privileges of the treaty during the remainder of the season, with the understanding that the President should bring the question before Congress at its next session and recommend a joint commission by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain.

This was done, but Congress disapproved the recommendation.

I might cite another instance, within my own experience in the brief time I have had the honor to be a Member of this body, in the debates upon the Russian treaty which occurred here and in which I think the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] perhaps participated, in which Congress dealt with a foreign question involving the foreign policy of the United States, involving a contract with a foreign power and the action of Russia in regard to American citizens of the Hebrew race. On account of certain alleged injustice and misconduct on the part of that country, as it was deemed by this country, Congress acted in that matter and terminated by act of Congress the treaty with Russia, the assertion of the Senator from Montana that Congress can not deal with a contract between this country and another country to the contrary notwithstanding.

I wish to cite a number of other instances. In Moore's Digest of International Law, page 363, a number of cases are cited in which Congress did deal with the foreign relations of the United States. I quote from that work:

In view of these well-known principles of law and matters of fact, it can not be supposed that it was intended, by the simple exchange of notes on January 31, 1891, to bind our Governments, as by a treaty, to certain duties or remissions of duty on the specified articles beyond the time when the Congress of the United States might, in the exercise of its constitutional powers, repeal the legislation under which the arrangement was concluded. By the terms of that legislation the President, so long as it was enforced, was invested with power to suspend its provisions touching the free entry of the specified articles under certain conditions the existence of which was to be determined by himself. It is to be assumed that the stipulation in the notes referred to in relation to the termination of the arrangement with Brazil was made with reference to that power, and that it was intended by the Executive merely as a declaration of the manner in which he would in the particular case exercise the special power conferred upon him by Congress. No other effect, it is conceived, can reasonably be ascribed to the stipulation.

From page 361, from the same volume, I quote the following:

It is manifest that the arrangement thus concluded rested wholly on legislation adopted by the United States of America and the United States of Brazil, respectively, and that the terms of this legislation were well known to the executive departments of both Governments, and were recognized by them as the basis of their action. So far, therefore, as the arrangement may have been considered as an international agreement it was made subject to the terms of that legislation.

Further, as to the agreements made in pursuance of acts of Congress, on page 218 of the same work:

The act of March 3, 1815, declared a repeal of discriminating duties against vessels, and products imported therein, of nations in which discriminating duties against the United States did not exist, the President to determine in each case by proclamation the application of the repeal. The acts of January 7, 1824, and May 24, 1828, likewise authorized the President to suspend by proclamation discriminating duties so far as they affected the vessels of a foreign nation, when possessed of satisfactory evidence that no such discriminating duties were imposed by that nation against the vessels of the United States. Section 11 of the act of June 19, 1886, as amended by the act of April 4, 1888, vests similar power in the President. A partial suspension is allowed by the act of July 24, 1897.

Here is the significant part of this extract which I am reading, which seems to me completely to explode, to whatever extent it may be of weight, not only the weight of this authority but the weight of the precedent in the action of Congress, the argument that Congress can not deal with a treaty, can not give instructions to the President as to negotiations with foreign countries. It seems to me to be impossible to differentiate this case, or these numerous cases which I have cited, in principle from the authority conferred upon the President under the pending bill.

I read:

On the authority of these statutes numerous arrangements have been reached with foreign States and made operative by proclamation. The evidence accepted by the President as sufficient may be a note or dispatch or a memorandum of an agreement.

Right there I pause to comment on the argument, as I understood it, of the Senator from Montana, that the transactions to be carried on with foreign countries under authority of this act constitute treaties and consequently must be dealt with by the treaty-making branch of the Government. It is difficult for me to construe a promissory note as a treaty. That is about all this transaction calls for. We are to take the bonds or the written promises to pay of these foreign countries under the terms of this act, in accordance with the limitations laid down therein. When they give us these promissory notes, how does that constitute a treaty? The transaction is completed. There is nothing further to be done. It is ended. Suppose we had a claim against some foreign country for $20, and Congress passed an act authorizing the President to accept a $10 gold piece from that foreign country in payment of that debt, and in pursuance of that statutory authority he accepted the $10 gold piece and put it into the Treasury of the United States; does that constitute a treaty between that country and the United States? Just so much as this transaction, in which we propose to accept from them certain written evidences of their obligations to us, would constitute a treaty.

Reading further from this authority, page 218, of the fifth volume of Moore's Digest of International Law, edition of 1906:

The proclamations relative to abolishing discriminating duties on trade with Cuba and Porto Rico of February 14, 1884, October 27, 1886, and September 21, 1887, were based on memoranda of agreements signed with Spain February 13, 1884, October 27, 1886, and September 21, 1887.

Section 3 of the tariff act of October 1, 1890, authorized and directed the President, whenever the Government of any country producing and exporting certain enumerated articles imposed duties or other exactions on the products of the United States which, in view of the free introduction of the enumerated articles into the United States, were, in his opinion, unreasonable or unequal, to suspend as to that country the privilege of free importation and subject the articles in question to certain discriminating duties.

* * * * * * *

There is authority to the President by act of Congress to make agreements with foreign countries. Ten commercial arrangements were concluded and made effective by means of this section.

Mr. President, I ask leave to incorporate in my remarks, without reading, the balance of this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Section 3 of the act of July 24, 1897, not only provides, as did section 3 of the act of 1890, for the imposition by proclamation of certain differential rates, but also for the conclusion by the President of commercial agreements with countries producing certain enumerated articles in which concessions may be secured in favor of the products of the United States; and it further authorizes the President, when such concessions are, in his judgment, reciprocal and equivalent, to suspend by proclamation the collection on those articles of the regular duties imposed by the act and subject them to special rates as provided in the section. On the authority of this section the President has concluded and made effective the commercial agreements of May 28, 1898, with France; May 22, 1899, with Portugal (protocol making corrections signed Jan. 11, 1900); July 10, 1900, with Germany; and February 8, 1900, with Italy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As I stated several days ago in a colloquy with the Senator from Montana, it has been decided on numerous occasions by the courts, and the Senator from Montana admits that, that Congress may by act affect a treaty which has been previously made. So, having jurisdiction to lay down terms and conditions of the subject matter dealt with by treaty after the treaty has been made, it has a like jurisdiction to deal with the same subject matter before the treaty has been made.

In Tucker's Constitutional Law, volume 2, page 723, this authority of Congress is discussed as follows:

A grave question has arisen whether the exclusive power of treaty making, vested in the President and Senate, is unlimited in its operation upon all the objects for which a treaty may provide.

I understood that to be the fair deduction from the statement of the Senator from Montana, which I read a little while ago.

Can a treaty by compact with a foreign nation bind all of the departments of our own Government as to matters fully confided to them; can it surrender or by agreement nullify the securities for personal liberty engrafted upon the Constitution itself; can it cede to a foreign power a State of the Union or any part of its territory without its consent?

The Senator from Montana seemed to express surprise the other day at the suggestion which I made that Congress could cede the territory of the United States to a foreign country. I assume that he concedes the power to cede territory, being undoubtedly an act of sovereignty, must be vested somewhere in the machinery of the Government, and that he contends that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, can cede territory of the United States, but that Congress, especially the House of Representatives, directly subject to the people by being compelled to return to them for reelection or for the election of a new House every two years, can not dispose of the territory and the property of the United States, but that the President and the Senate may do so. It seems to me to be a preposterous argument, especially as such power is expressly conferred upon Congress by the Constitution.

I read further:

Can it regulate commerce with foreign nations in spite of the power of Congress to regulate commerce with them; can it provide for the rates of duty to be imposed upon certain articles imported from foreign nations or admit them free of duty, in the face of the power given to Congress to lay and collect taxes and duties; can a treaty appropriate money from the Public Treasury and withdraw it without the action of Congress; can a treaty dispose of any part of the territory of the United States, or any of their property—

"Any of their property"—and I presume the nine or ten billion dollars of obligations owing to us is property of the United States—without the consent of Congress, which alone has power to dispose of and make rules and regulations concerning the territory and other property of the United States?

These important questions have several times arisen for discussion in our history, and upon them authoritative decisions have been made by other departments of the Government, which are based upon solid reason and sound principles of constitutional construction.

It can not be denied that very many of these questions must be answered in the negative, or the consequence would be that, under the treaty-making power, the President and Senate might absorb all the powers of the Government. In favor of the extreme claim of power for the President and Senate, it has been urged that a contract between the United States and a foreign nation must be conclusive against all departments of the Government, because it is a contract; but the answer to this contention is obvious and conclusive. It involves the petitio principii, by assuming that the contract is complete though it trenches upon the power of the other departments of the Government, without their consent. And if it be further urged that foreign nations know no party in the contract on the part of the United States except the President and Senate, the answer is equally conclusive that if our Constitution requires the consent of the departments to a treaty of the nature referred to, the foreign nation is bound to take notice of that fact, and can not claim a completed obligation, in the absence of the consent of the other departments. The maxim upon this subject is familiar: qui cum alio contrahit vel est, vel debet esse, non ignarus conditionis ejus. And if it be further urged that this is too refined a doctrine to regulate our delicate relations with foreign powers, the answer is that the treaty-making power of the Crown of Great Britain, where it involves a concession of the clear and absolute power of Parliament, has never been recognized as valid by the English Government, and has never been enforced.

To turn aside for just a moment from the immediate question, to refer for a moment to the duty of foreign nations dealing with us in the negotiation of a treaty to know and to be bound by the provisions of our Constitution, and the animadversions which from time to time in foreign countries and to some extent in this country have been passed upon the failure of our Government in certain instances to ratify treaties which have been negotiated by the President of the United States, I may call attention to the fact which is pointed out in the extract which I have just read, of which we have many modern instances subsequent to the publication of this great constitutional work of John Randolph Tucker, that foreign nations themselves have the same constitutional limitations, requiring the ratification of a treaty by their legislatures. The treaty of Versailles which was submitted by the President of the United States to the Senate, but which failed to receive the necessary two-thirds vote of that body to give it life, likewise was submitted to the legislative bodies of each one of the principal European powers who were parties to it and their legislative assent was required before it became binding upon the people of those nations. So, it does not lie in their mouths to complain of us that the legislative branch of our Government which deals with treaties likewise exercised its discretion as did their own parliaments.

The Queen may make a treaty to pay $10,000,000 to the French Government, but unless Parliament appropriates the money the treaty will be ineffectual. "It is from the fundamental laws of each State that we must learn where resides the authority that is capable of contracting with validity in the name of a State."

A treaty, therefore, can not take away essential liberties secured by the Constitution to the people. A treaty can not bind the United States to do what their Constitution forbids them to do. We may suggest a further limitation: A treaty can not compel any department of the Government to do what the Constitution submits to its exclusive and absolute will. On these questions the true canon of construction, that the treaty-making power, in its seeming absoluteness and unconditional extent, is confronted with equally absolute and unconditional authority vested in the judiciary. Therefore, neither must be construed as absolute and unconditioned, but each must be construed and conditioned upon the equally clear power vested in the others. For example, Congress has power to lay and collect duties; the President and Senate have power to make a contract with a foreign nation in respect to such duties. Can any other construction be given to these two apparently contradictory powers than that the general power to make treaties must yield to the specific power of Congress to lay and collect all duties—

And so it might be said in regard to the specific power of Congress to deal with property of the United States—and while the treaty may propose a contract as to duties on articles coming from a foreign nation, such an executory contract can not be valid and binding unless Congress, which has supreme authority to lay and collect duties, consents to it.

I ask leave to print as a portion of my remarks the remainder of this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

If it is then asked how are you to reconcile these two powers which appear to be antagonistic, the answer is clear. Congress has no capacity to negotiate a treaty with a foreign power. The extent of its membership makes this impracticable. The Constitution, therefore, left the House of Representatives out of all consideration in negotiating treaties. The executory contract between the United States and a foreign nation is therefore confided to the one man who can conduct the negotiations and to a select body who can advise and consent to the treaty he has negotiated. But this executory contract must depend for its execution upon the supreme power vested in Congress "to lay and collect duties." It is therefore a contract not completed, but inchoate, and can only be completed and binding when Congress shall, by legislation, consent thereto, and lay duties in accordance with the executory contract or treaty. The same reasoning may apply to all of the great powers vested in Congress, such as to "borrow money, regulate commerce, coin money, raise armies and provide a navy, make laws as to naturalization, bankruptcies, and exercise exclusive legislation" in the District of Columbia and Territories of the country. If these are sought by treaty to be regulated by the President and Senate, it can only be done when the Congress vested with these great powers shall give its unconditional consent.

Mr. Madison, in the reports of the convention which he has left to us, used an expression which is significant upon this point. He intimated that in making treaties eventual, that is, complete and final per se, the treaty-making power might be independent; but where they referred to matters that were incomplete without legislation, they would be incomplete until that consent was given.

The absurdity of any other construction as to the power to lay taxes, duties, and so on, is very palpable. We have seen from the Constitution that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives, to which the Senate may or may not assent, and the President may veto; but if the President and Senate have the power to regulate the system of taxation and revenue by treaty without the consent of Congress, then the House of Representatives, which by the terms of the Constitution is made the originating body for such bills, without whose primal action the President and Senate can have no voice whatever in the matter, is to be excluded from any consent to the terms of the treaty of the President and Senate, who, by the constitutional method are not entitled to act at all until the House of Representatives has inaugurated a bill.

The reason in the nature of our system which makes the conclusion absolute is that in the balance of power which was ordained by the convention, the House of Representatives was to originate all taxation upon the people. The people at large dreaded the placing of the tax power in the hands of a majority of the States without regard to their size, and insisted that the power should be in the hands of the States according to the numerical proportion of their population. To give the President, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the Senators present, the power to regulate taxation, is to reverse this scheme and destroy the equilibrium of the Constitution. For in 1790 two-thirds of the States containing 1,685,360 people could ratify a treaty against the other third of the States containing a population of 2,166,419; that is to say, that a minority could tax at will the majority. By the census of 1880 two-thirds of the Senate, representing 19,755,532, could regulate taxation against the other third, containing a population of 29,615,818; and by the late census of 1890 this disproportion would be greatly increased.

It has been shown in previous parts of this work that the regulation of commerce by a majority vote of the two Houses, instead of requiring two-thirds, was the result of a concession made upon a compromise. But if this regulation of commerce can be made by two-thirds of the States in the Senate, then under the census of 1880, above shown, two-fifths of the population of the country could regulate commerce against the other three-fifths, instead of the original purpose to require a vote of two-thirds to do so.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I direct especial attention to this statement by Mr. Tucker:

If these are sought by treaty to be regulated by the President and Senate, it can only be done when the Congress vested with these great powers shall give its unconditional consent.

Congress, as I have said several times heretofore, in my opinion, could give its assent after the negotiation, but Congress is asked by this bill to act in advance of the negotiations, to specify the terms which it will approve. It has been suggested by some Senators that there should be attached to this measure the requirement that whatever arrangements should be negotiated with foreign countries by the President should not take effect until they are again referred to Congress for its approval. It seems to me that that might be done, but it is perfectly superfluous if Congress sees fit before the negotiations to state the terms upon which they may be made. That is a more businesslike way of doing it, and that is exactly what we propose to do by this measure.

I now quote from Von Holst on Constitutional Law, on page 202, of volume 1:

As to the extent of the treaty power, the Constitution says nothing, but it evidently can not be unlimited. The power exists only under the Constitution, and every treaty stipulation inconsistent with a provision of the Constitution is therefore inadmissible and according to constitutional law ipso facto null and void. Simple and self-evident as this principle is in theory, yet it may be very difficult under certain circumstances to decide whether or not it has been transgressed in fact. Indeed, the chief difficulty arises from the question of the relation the treaty power of the President with the concurrence power of the Senate bears to the legislative power of Congress. This question is answered by saying that these powers must be coordinate, for treaties like laws are "sovereign acts," which differ from laws only in forms and in the organs by which the sovereign will expresses itself. It follows from this principle that a law can be repealed by a treaty as well as a treaty by a law. If a treaty and a law are in opposition, their respective dates must decide whether the one or the other is to be regarded as repealed. Neither the principle nor the correctness of these conclusions from it can well be disputed, and they are at any rate valid under constitutional law.

I quote from Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, at pages 31 and 32, as follows:

As between a law of the United States made in pursuance of the Constitution and a treaty made under the authority of the United States, if the two in any of their provisions are found in conflict, the one last in point of time must control. For the one as well as the other is an act of sovereignty, differing only in form and in the organ or agency through which the sovereign will is declared. Each alike is the law of the land in its adoption, and the last law must repeal everything that is of no higher authority which is found to come in conflict with it. A treaty may therefore supersede a prior act of Congress; and, on the other hand, an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty.

Very briefly, Mr. President, I want to call attention to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Chinese Exclusion case, if I may be allowed to repeat in another form its effect as to the power of Congress to deal with foreign nations or whether Congress is confined to domestic matters in its jurisdiction, whether a Chinaman may come into the United States is a matter that affects China and also affects the United States; consequently it is a proper matter of negotiation and treaty enactment between those two countries; but if Congress passes a law providing that a Chinaman can not come into the United States, that law of Congress affects China just as it affects the United States. We can not possibly escape from that conclusion. So I say that the argument that it does not deal with a foreign matter is rather supertechnical. In the Chinese Exclusion case, at page 600, One hundred and thirteenth United States Reports, it is stated:

It must be conceded that the act of 1888 is in contravention of express stipulations of the treaty of 1868 and of the supplemental treaty of 1880, but it is not on that account invalid or to be restricted in its enforcement. The treaties were of no greater legal obligation than the act of Congress. By the Constitution, laws made in pursuance thereof and treaties made under the authority of the United States are both declared to be the supreme law of the land, and no paramount authority is given to one over the other. A treaty, it is true, is in its nature a contract between nations and is often merely promissory in its character, requiring legislation to carry its stipulations into effect. Such legislation will be open to future repeal or amendment. If the treaty operates by its own force, and relates to a subject within the power of Congress, it can be deemed in that particular only the equivalent of a legislative act, to be repealed or modified at the pleasure of Congress. In either case the last expression of the sovereign will must control.

I shall quote from another decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, and then I shall have concluded. I read from the decision of the court in the leading case of Fong Yue Ting v. United States (149 U. S., p. 713), as follows:

The power to exclude or to expel aliens, being a power affecting international relations, is vested in the political departments of the Government, and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of Congress—

I commend that particularly to the attention of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

The power to exclude or expel aliens being a power affecting international relations—

And, therefore, not being a domestic matter—is vested in the political departments of the Government and is to be regulated by treaty or by act of Congress, and to be executed by the executive authority according to the regulations so established, except so far as the judicial department has been authorized by treaty or by statute, or is required by the paramount law of the Constitution, to intervene.

In Nishimura Ekiu's case, it was adjudged that, although Congress might, if it saw fit, authorize the courts to investigate and ascertain the facts upon which the alien's right to land was made by the statutes to depend, yet Congress might intrust the final determination of those facts to an executive officer, and that if it did so, his order was due process of law, and no other tribunal, unless expressly authorized by law to do so, was at liberty to reexamine the evidence on which he acted, or to controvert its sufficiency.

* * * * * * *

In our jurisprudence, it is well settled that the provisions of an act of Congress, passed in the exercise of its constitutional authority, on this, as on any other subject, if clear and explicit, must be upheld by the courts, even in contravention of express stipulations in an earlier treaty. As was said by this court in Chae Chan Ping's case, following previous decisions: "The treaties were of no greater legal obligation than the act of Congress. By the Constitution, laws made in pursuance thereof and treaties made under the authority of the United States are both declared to be the supreme law of the land, and no paramount authority is given to one over the other. A treaty, it is true, is in its nature a contract between nations, and is often merely promissory in its character, requiring legislation to carry its stipulations into effect. Such legislation will be open to future repeal or amendment. If the treaty operates by its own force and relates to a subject within the power of Congress, it can be deemed in that particular only the equivalent of a legislative act, to be repealed or modified at the pleasure of Congress. In either case, the last expression of the sovereign will must control." "So far as a treaty made by the United States with any foreign nation can become the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal."

So, Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States has held that Congress may deal with international relations in the matter of the exclusion of immigrants from a foreign country, and that in doing so it may act through an executive officer to be selected by itself. That is in principle an exercise of the same authority as proposed by the pending bill when it authorizes the President to appoint a commission, subject to the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should like to inquire from the Senator whether he ever understood me to assert that Congress had no power to enact legislation which may possibly affect foreign relations?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the Senator to assert that the jurisdiction of Congress was limited to domestic matters, and I have read a decision of the Supreme Court which said that it could deal with international matters.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator obviously misunderstood me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I read from the RECORD a quotation from the remarks of the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator misunderstood the RECORD.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think it could be misunderstood; it was very plain.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, all our tariff legislation in a certain sense affects foreign countries; every customs law affects foreign countries; every shipping law affects foreign countries——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Every immigration law affects foreign countries. There is a vast field of legislation which it is very proper for Congress to enact that affects foreign relations. The Senator did not understand me. My statement was that with respect to negotiation of contracts and treaties with foreign countries Congress is powerless.

Mr. POINDEXTER. All I claim that we are seeking to do is to affect them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator understands that I have no controversy with him as to the point to which I have referred.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understand the Senator, I think. I read from the remarks of the Senator:

The question of the treaty-making power had some little consideration from Alexander Hamilton at the time the Constitution was before the country for ratification, and he laid down the doctrine, which I think has never been controverted, that the legislative power deals with domestic matters exclusively.

If the Senator makes the distinction that legislation which merely affects foreign matters does not deal with them, I have no quarrel with that; he is at perfect liberty to derive any possible comfort he may from that distinction. To "affect" foreign contracts and foreign relations is all that is proposed or desired. If the Senator claims that is not "dealing with them," it is immaterial. The object is nevertheless accomplished. When we pass a law laying down the limitations under which the executive authority can refund the obligations of foreign countries to us we are affecting matters of international interest, of relative international concern, and that is all that is necessary; that is all that I contend for. If I understand correctly the Senator to say it "affects," but does not "deal with them," he is perfectly welcome to draw that distinction, but I care nothing whatever about such a distinction. I am perfectly aware that Congress can not make a treaty; there is no dispute between us on that score; but it can deal with or affect—the proposition may be stated in either way desired—international matters. That is all that this bill proposes to do. I understand that the Senator admits that Congress has that authority. So I fail to see upon what ground his contention that the act is unconstitutional can be maintained. When Congress by express enactment repeals a treaty, as in the instance of the Russian treaty, it seems to me it is "dealing with it," but if the Senator from Montana would have it that way, I am content that we should say it was merely "affecting it." When we enact a Canadian reciprocity act, to go into effect when a similar act is passed by Canada, it seems as though Congress is "dealing" with foreign relations, and the effect is just the same if it is merely said to "affect" our foreign relations. So likewise, when commissions have been maintained and authorized by acts of Congress to negotiate boundaries, and when trade compacts in the many instances cited have been made by the President with foreign countries upon the authority and instruction of acts of Congress, Congress was exercising its control, as it is proposing to do here, over the foreign as well as the domestic affairs of the Nation.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Macon (Ga.) Telegraph of the 25th instant relative to the pending bill.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Editorial from the Macon (Ga.) Telegraph, Jan. 25, 1922.]

GIVE THEM A HUNDRED YEARS.

As a matter of course it is sincerely hoped that the United States Senate will arrive at the wisest and best possible solution of the question as to what should be done with the debt owed this Government by the nations of the Old World, whatever the decision may be. But we venture to suggest to so august and wise a body the thought that the soldier bonus and the foreign debt are two entirely separate issues. They should not be amalgamated or confused, for in so doing it is very probable that in an endeavor to adapt or adjust one to the other a muddle of impracticability may be made of both.

In the first place, in an endeavor to solve the foreign-debt question, considering it separately, we should bear in mind that much of this money or debt is on account of war activities while the debtors were our war associates. Therefore it isn't just an ordinary debt. It represents money or valuables which we should have freely given, if necessary, to have kept these countries in the war as our associates. We should have cheerfully agreed to furnish the necessary war supplies if those countries would have agreed to furnish the men to use them. And if, after we got into the war, those countries had withdrawn from it, we should have in all probability been fighting Germany to this day, both with our men and materials.

In the next place, these countries, in times of peace and prosperity, were our customers. It was the people of those countries with their purchasing power that made markets for the surplus of our farms and manufactories. These former good customers are now about bankrupt. And in consequence of this condition we have stagnated in this country, gorged to the goozle with production for which there is no market. The longer this state of bankruptcy is approximated or continued among our former good customers the longer we shall choke.

The twin brothers, bankruptcy and poverty, are flourishing in Europe. It is to our interest to relieve this condition in so far as possible, just like any ordinary business enterprise, and get these former customers back on their feet. The way an everyday business affair is handled is that when a former good customer comes in and makes a showing of his assets and liabilities the creditors get together and decide on whether they will put him through bankruptcy, injuring his credit and forever impairing his business status; whether or not they will accept a compromise as the best disposition of the case; or whether or not they will give him time in which to work out his problem and save his credit.

In this case we earnestly urge the last of the three named solutions. Whatever is done should not involve any suggestion of charity, because charity tends to cheapen and destroy the object it seeks to help. Let our debtors pay their debts, but on such terms that it will not hinder nor embarrass their early restoration to place and power in the consuming and commercial world. Why not give them something like a hundred years in which to liquidate, at such a low rate of interest—say about 2 per cent—that it will not be a burden to them? We could well afford to write off the entire account, from a business standpoint, but there would be no respect on either side for the parties to such a transaction. If it had been handled originally as a gift or as supplies furnished for the account of the United States in war all would have been satisfactory. But it is in the shape of debt, an obligation, and it must be handled as such to maintain and retain the proper status of all parties.

The soldier bonus is another matter entirely. The soldiers are entitled to their deserts, regardless of the foreign debt. We owe them, or we don't owe them, and their case should be met and disposed of squarely on its merits. Trying to ride two horses to the mill is apt to spill the grain with which they are loaded.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, after listening for a considerable length of time to the debate upon the question raised by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I have not in the slightest degree changed by opinion and conviction in reference to what I stated the other day, namely, that there is a very broad field in which concurrently the treaty-making power and the legislative power of Congress can operate, and each law made by the Executive through the treaty-making power or by the Congress of the United States will become the law of the land, and the latter, in so far as it modifies a previous law made by the Congress or by the Executive power through treaty, will govern. I still hold to that conviction, and I hold equally to the proposition that we can pass many laws subject to the action of a foreign Government, which will become operative when the foreign Government acts.

I have no doubt, of course, of the power which was exercised by which we made a treaty with Russia for the cession of Alaska. I have not the slightest doubt in my mind that we could have passed a congressional act which would declare that if the Russian Government should make a cession of the Territory of Alaska to the United States, upon that cession being filed with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized to make a payment of $8,000,000 to the Russian Government, and that it would be a binding law, and that that is one case in which the same result could be effectuated either through the treaty-making power or through an act of Congress.

But, Mr. President, I want to add one more case to the cases of precedents which have been cited and which I think perhaps is more in point to-day than anything that has been recited so far. I refer to the settlement of the Boxer rebellion claims.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The power under the Constitution to acquire additional territory was at one time the subject, as the Senator will recall, of very earnest contention by expounders of the Constitution. Some of them went so far as to claim that it could not be done under the Constitution; but the Supreme Court of the United States held that the power to acquire territory was referable either to the power to make treaties or to the power to declare war. It never occurred to the Supreme Court that it was a proper subject for congressional action. At least, none of the great expounders of the Constitution, including John Marshall, who in the Insurance Company case first laid down the doctrine that territory could be acquired, thought of getting it in the way of which the Senator now speaks; but let me ask the Senator this question:

Suppose that such legislation as the Senator has spoken of were enacted. Congress passes a law to the effect that if Russia should pass an act ceding Alaska to the United States, then the Secretary of the Treasury should pay to Russia $7,500,000, and thereupon, as I understand the Senator, the jurisdiction of the United States would be extended over Alaska. Suppose, however, the President of the United States should veto that congressional act, and suppose that the Congress then passed the law over his veto; would the jurisdiction of the United States then be extended over Alaska?

Mr. McCUMBER. The moment that the cession from the Russian Government had been made to the United States I claim that it would. Of course, there was no such enactment. Therefore the case in that form could not be before the Supreme Court; but I have not the slightest doubt in the world that if we made the proposition even to a foreign Government as a legislative act, and the foreign Government accepted, that, if it was one in which the Congress had jurisdiction in the matter of payment and in the matter of receiving an agreement from a foreign nation, we could do so.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I understand the Senator to answer "Yes" to my question——

Mr. McCUMBER. Practically.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That if the President vetoed that act, and it was passed over his veto, and the money was paid to Russia, that would be territory of the United States; and then the Senator would contend that if a man were charged with having committed a crime in Alaska he would be triable before the courts of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States would hold that the crime had been committed within the jurisdiction of the United States. I deny that.

Mr. McCUMBER. It would be within territory owned by the United States. The territory would have to belong to some one.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Russia would have the right to cede that territory; and when Russia had ceded that territory, and had received the cash of the United States, that territory would have some status, and the status would be that of a possession of the United States. As to what laws would be applicable, I do not care to argue at this time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator contends that it would be the territory of the United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish, however, to call attention to another case that, to my mind, is exactly in point.

The Senator from Montana at least indicates that the law under which these foreign obligations were created was of doubtful legality or authority, but that if we had such authority it must be based upon a war authority and not upon the general powers of Congress.

I do not care what position he takes in the matter, because there is no court that can ever pass judgment upon the obligation of a foreign Government to another foreign Government except the court of conscience of that Government itself as to whether it will make good; but I will take the other case.

By a mere protocol in 1901 we received the indemnity bonds of China for something more than $24,000,000. Senators can raise the question, if they see fit, that this Government had no right to receive the Chinese bonds because we had made no treaty with China, and a protocol is not a treaty; but we did receive the Chinese bonds. We acquiesced in the action of the executive department. The bonds were as legal against China, probably, as any bond could be, because China had agreed to them. Likewise, we have the obligations of these foreign Governments, made exactly in the same way, except that instead of a protocol they were made under an act of Congress the validity of which the Senator may question.

Now, the question arises, can Congress deal with the subject? Let me give a case exactly in point as a precedent, at least, and that is a joint resolution to provide for the remission of a portion of the Chinese indemnity. That joint resolution was approved May 25, 1908, and I want to recite just a portion of it:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized to consent to a modification of the bond for $24,440,778.81, dated December 15, 1906, received from China pursuant to the protocol of September 7, 1901, for indemnity against losses and expenses incurred by reason of the so-called Boxer disturbances in China during the year 1900, so that the total payment to be made by China under the said bond shall be limited to the sum of $13,655,492.69 and interest at the stipulated rate of 4 per cent per annum, and that the remainder of the indemnity to which the United States is entitled under the said protocol and bond may be remitted as an act of friendship, such payments and remission to be at such times and in such manner as the President shall deem just.

And then, by a proviso, we retained $2,000,000 of the finally agreed sum to pay the indemnity for injuries done to American citizens, and several other conditions connected with that.

There was a law passed by Congress. I have no doubt but that the matter might have been dealt with by a treaty made with China; but it could also have been dealt with in this manner, and it was dealt with in this manner.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. If we could exercise our legislative authority over the matter of remitting any portion of that claim or of changing its terms in any manner, why can we not do the same thing with reference to the obligations of these other countries?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for a question.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. A day or so ago the Senator from North Dakota made a statement on the floor with reference to some sort of consent agreement by some official of the Government to extend for two or three years, as I understood him, the interest collections on these immense debts. Will the Senator be so kind as to name the official who made that informal agreement?

Mr. McCUMBER. My remembrance is that it was Secretary Houston.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Will the Senator state in what form evidence can be found with reference to that fact?

Mr. McCUMBER. It will be found in the report of Secretary Houston, and in the hearings before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I merely wished to have it made a matter of record.

Mr. McCUMBER. I shall try to do so. It is not before me just at the present time; but I shall get it and put it into the RECORD, as the Senator has requested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to, taken from pages 58 and 59 of the annual report of Secretary Houston on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1920, is as follows:

In the early autumn of 1919 the Treasury informed the treasuries of the European Governments to which it had made advances that it was prepared, in case they so desired, to discuss with them the exchange of the demand notes for long-time obligations, and in that connection the deferring of interest collection during the reconstruction period of two or three years from the spring of 1919.

Mr. McCUMBER. The following is an excerpt from the letter of Secretary Mellon to Senator Penrose, pages 179 and 180 of the hearings before the Committee on Finance:

1. In view of the action of my predecessors I am of the opinion that as to the principal foreign Governments receiving advances from the proceeds of Liberty bonds, this Government is committed to the postponement of the interest for two or three years (over two years of which have already elapsed) and to the spreading over subsequent years the payment of the postponed interest installments; but that this obligation is contingent upon such foreign Government carrying out with reasonable promptness, after this Government is ready to proceed, a satisfactory funding of its existing short-time obligations to this country. As to the compounding of interest, Secretary Houston, in his annual report to Congress for the year 1920, clearly shows that it was not contemplated that interest should be charged on the postponed interest, at least during the two or three year period. However, I regard the dates suggested by Secretary Houston in his annual report for the payment of this deferred interest as merely tentative and not a binding commitment.

In view of the public announcement on this subject made by Secretary Glass, communicated as it was to the foreign Governments, reported to Congress by both Secretary Glass and Secretary Houston, and acquiesced in for more than two years, I think good faith and fair dealing obligate this Government to the extent I have indicated.

The following is an excerpt from pages 188, 189, 192, and 193 of the hearings before the Committee on Finance:

Senator WALSH (reading): "In view of the public announcement on this subject made by Secretary GLASS, communicated as it was to the foreign Governments, reported to Congress by both Secretary GLASS and Secretary Houston, and acquiesced in for more than two years, I think, good faith and fair dealing obligate this Government to the extent I have indicated."

I wish you would explain just to what extent Secretary GLASS and Secretary Houston have committed this country to the policy or the position of not collecting interest on overdue interest.

Secretary MELLON. The Treasury made this statement to the foreign Governments.

Senator WALSH. Who was Treasurer at the time of the statement?

Secretary MELLON. I believe Secretary GLASS was.

Senator WALSH. Who is it directed to, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary MELLON. To the British Treasury. Mr. Chamberlain replied to it——

Senator WALSH. Have you the date, Mr. Mellon?

Secretary MELLON. Yes; December 2, 1919.

Senator WALSH. Now, give us the communication that you refer to.

Secretary MELLON (reading): "The Treasury is prepared, at the convenience of the Governments of the Allies, to take up with their representatives the funding of the demand obligations which the United States holds into long-time obligations and at the same time refunding during the reconstruction period of, say, for a year or two or three years of the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States under the Liberty loan acts."

That was stated to the foreign Governments.

Senator WALSH. Do you construe that language to bind our Government to a position of refusing to insist upon compound interest?

Secretary MELLON. I can not see how it could be otherwise. That was replied to by Mr. Chamberlain, of Great Britain. * * *

The chancellor replied as follows:

"You are already aware that the British Government accepts, as far as they are concerned, the suggestions of the United States that the demand obligation of the Allies should be funded into long-time obligations and that for a period of two or three years—preferably three—the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States should also be funded, and that we are ready to extend similar treatment to our allies in respect of their obligations to us."

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want a word with the Senate now with reference to the time of voting upon this question, to see if we can get a unanimous-consent agreement.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], who has seemingly, at least, had charge of the matter on the other side of the Chamber, indicated yesterday a desire to come to a vote some time to-day; and we took a recess a little before 5 o'clock yesterday afternoon with the understanding, at least, that when we met this morning the first thing we would do would be to have an agreement to vote upon the bill to-day. It was satisfactory to the Senator from North Carolina, after talking the matter over, as I understood, with some of his colleagues on the other side, that we should vote on the bill at 3 o'clock to-day. A good deal of snow has fallen over the country since that time, making travel somewhat difficult, and the Senator from North Carolina has not been able to attend the session to-day.

I am going to ask, not that we may have a final vote on Monday, but that after 3 o'clock on Monday no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes upon the bill or upon any amendment that may be offered thereto. This is not an agreement to vote at any particular time, but to limit the debate; and, of course, it will be accompanied by a request that when we conclude our labors to-day we shall recess until Monday at 11 o'clock.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have conferred with a number of Senators who have been interested in the bill, and there is a general feeling that, beginning at some time on Monday, the length of speeches should be limited; but no one, I believe, has expressed a willingness to agree to the limitation which the Senator from North Dakota has suggested. The common expression is about this—that beginning at even 2 o'clock on Monday the speeches upon the bill should be limited to 20 minutes, and the speeches upon each amendment to 10 minutes. I believe that is about the concurrence of view so far as I have been able to ascertain it, and it seems to me that that is a reasonable limitation; for, as the Senator well knows, whenever we get any kind of a limitation, we soon thereafter reach a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I will ask if the Senator would not agree that after a certain hour to be fixed on Monday the limit shall be 10 minutes on the principal bill and amendments?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I do not think we can come to any agreement to-day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say, after some hour. Make it 4 o'clock, if the Senator desires.

Mr. OVERMAN. I know that my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] was anxious to have a final vote on this measure to-day. He is snowbound and unable to get here. From the weather reports, the snow is going to continue. Whether my colleague will be able to be here Monday or not, I do not know. According to the weather reports, we may not have a quorum here Monday. I would not agree to any unanimous-consent agreement to-day. I think there will be no trouble about voting on the bill Monday if we can get a quorum here and my colleague is here.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would the Senator from North Carolina object to the unanimous-consent agreement suggested by the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. OVERMAN. That would give each Senator half an hour. I think my colleague would be satisfied with a provision that no speech shall be longer than half an hour.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I thought that my proposal would probably meet the views of those who suggested that each Senator should have half an hour altogether; that is, that we divide it so as to give 20 minutes upon the bill and 10 minutes upon each amendment. That, in any event, would give at least 30 minutes to anyone who desired to consume so much time. It occurred to me that my suggestion was even more liberal than a general limitation of 30 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. We were discussing a modification of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will put the request in the form in which the Senator from New Mexico has just now placed it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from North Dakota state his request as modified?

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from New Mexico signify again the hour at which he desires to have the debate limited? Will 2 o'clock be satisfactory?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It will be satisfactory to me but other Senators suggest 3 o'clock. I suggest that we meet at 11 o'clock, and that at 3 o'clock on Monday debate shall be limited to 20 minutes on the bill and 10 minutes on each amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. That will give half an hour altogether.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; and even more than that, if a Senator should desire to discuss more than one amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall not object to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will present the request in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the request as now framed.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT AGREEMENT.

It is agreed by unanimous consent that from and after 3 o'clock p. m., on the calendar day of Monday, January 30, 1922, no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes upon the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes, or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto; and, further, that at the conclusion of the business of the Senate this day the Senate will take a recess until 11 o'clock, a. m., on Monday, January 30, 1922.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I wish to ask the Senator from North Dakota if this means an early recess to-day?

Mr. McCUMBER. It means a recess whenever the Senate may agree to take a recess. I am ready to recess at any time to-day, but I desire to leave the hour subject to the wishes of those who may want to speak to-day. We do not desire to take a recess while anyone wishes to speak to-day.

Mr. KELLOGG. Do I understand that the Senator from North Dakota has agreed that after we have had a week of debate on the bill we are going to have another week or 10 days of debate?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think it will take even three hours after the time has been fixed before the matter will be settled. Without question, we shall reach a vote on Monday, if we have the agreement proposed. I have no doubt about it in the world. I know if this agreement is made, it is the expectation of those who are proposing it in good faith to get through on Monday.

Mr. KELLOGG. We are simply wasting time in debating matters that have not any importance whatever. The Senate has been for two or three weeks debating a measure of this kind which had already been debated over and over again.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from Minnesota will not make an objection to the proposed unanimous-consent agreement. It has been talked over, and I feel quite sure that it will save time, and that the vote will be taken on Monday under the agreement. I can assure my friend from Minnesota that that will be the case.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall not make any objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement submitted by the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I propose to offer to the pending measure in due time, and ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment of Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts is, on page 3, line 14, after the word "finances," to insert—but said commission shall immediately transmit to the Congress copies of any refunding agreements entered into, with the approval of the President, by each foreign Government upon the completion of the authority granted under this act.

THE MUSCLE SHOALS PLANT.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, several days ago I called the attention of the Senate to the lobby and propaganda of the Fertilizer Trust and Water Power Trust to prejudice Congress against the lease of Muscle Shoals to Henry Ford or anyone else. I had printed in the RECORD extracts of letters and circulars which have been sent to Members, both of the House and the Senate; also to newspapers and others. They contained many false and misleading statements. These statements were contradicted yesterday at a meeting of the House Committee on Military Affairs by the Government's expert, Maj. Gen. C. C. Williams, Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, and one of the ablest and most efficient officers in our Army. Gen. Williams has reflected great credit on himself and our Government in all the important positions he has held since graduating at West Point. His statements appeared in the Baltimore Sun, which I ask to be inserted in the RECORD; also from the same paper indorsements of the Henry Ford offer by the Farmers' Conference now in session here. I also ask to be inserted in the RECORD a copy of telegram I sent Henry Ford on yesterday and the reply relative to incorporation in the contract of an agreement to manufacture fertilizers and sell to the farmers at a profit not exceeding 7 per cent. I also wish to insert copies of telegrams and letters relative to the Henry Ford lease.

There being no objection, the documents referred to were ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

JANUARY 27, 1922.

Hon. HENRY FORD,
Detroit, Mich.:

In Washington Star news article yesterday statement is made relative to your contract for Muscle Shoals, saying "one phase of the report, it was understood, will call attention of Congress to the absence from the contract of a provision definitely guaranteeing the manufacture of fertilizers by the plants after they are made operative under the Ford offer. Mr. Weeks steadfastly favored the inclusion of such a provision in the contract, but was unable throughout the negotiations to persuade Mr. Ford to accept the suggestion in the form desired by the Secretary of War."

If this statement is correct, Members of the Senate and House, including the agricultural bloc and delegates to farmers' conference and millions of farmers who approved your efforts will be greatly disappointed to know the farmers will be left at the mercy of the Fertilizer Trust. I recall press dispatches at one time said you would guarantee to sell fertilizers at profit not exceeding 7 per cent. The farmers are in deplorable condition and very despondent, and one hope of encouragement has been that Henry Ford would arrange through Muscle Shoals plant to get them cheaper fertilizers. In my judgment there is no doubt about Congress agreeing to lease with provision to insure farmers fertilizers. I sincerely hope the inclusion of such a proposition would not be objectionable on your part.

WM. J. HARRIS.

Resolutions carried unanimously indorsing Ford's Muscle Shoals proposition. Urge passage.

WASHINGTON KIWANIS CLUB.

Whereas it has been brought to the attention of the Kiwanis Club, of Rome, Ga., that Henry Ford has made an offer to the United States Government for the Muscle Shoals project, and that by the terms of that offer this work will be completed and operated; and

Whereas it will be of inestimable value to the South and all parts of this country to have said project completed and operated; and

Whereas having confidence in the honesty and ability of Henry Ford to complete this work and operate this plant to the best interests of the people: Be it

Resolved by the Kiwanis Club, of Rome, Ga., That we heartily indorse the offer of Henry Ford and ask that this offer be accepted by the United States Government; be it

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS, Senator T. E. WATSON, and Representative GORDON LEE, with the request that they use their utmost interest to see that this offer is accepted; be it

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to national headquarters of this club, with the request that a copy of the same be forwarded to each Kiwanis Club in this country with the request that they take similar action; and be it

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to Henry Ford.

Above resolution unanimously adopted.

ATLANTA UNION LABEL LEAGUE,
Atlanta Ga., January 23, 1922.

Hon. WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: At a regular meeting of the Atlanta Union Lable League held on the 18th of January I was instructed to address an appeal to you in behalf of Mr. Henry Ford's offer to take over the Government nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, Ala., and to respectfully request that you use your good offices and influence in the United States Congress in securing the contract to Mr. Ford.

The masses of the people in the State of Georgia realize that the Ford offer, if accepted by the Government, will do more to relieve the southern farmer and the unemployed in the South than any other scheme yet offered; also the United States Government will be relieved of the large expenditure in money necessary to complete and operate the plants, which will be a great saving in taxes to the people.

With very best wishes, I am,

Very truly, yours,

T. J. BOGGS,
Secretary-Treasurer Atlanta Union Label League.

PHILADELPHIA, January 27, 1922.

Hon. Senator HARRIS.

RESPECTED SIR: Many of us are glad to know that you are taking the necessary steps to prevent certain immensely wealthy and powerful business cliques from balking Mr. Henry Ford's efforts to show how Muscle Shoals water properties can be run for the real benefit of this Nation.

Everyone knows by this time that Henry Ford can make good and that he is a power to be reckoned with outside of Wall Street trusts and allied interests, which forever stand in the way of material improvements and public interests which they do not control for their own uses.

If Mr. Ford had his rights, he and not NEWBERRY would be in Congress at this moment. Show up these men who are again trying to cheat Henry Ford out of this chance to help the American people into newer, practical, and better industrial methods at this time, when the rest of the "barons of industry" have fallen down on their jobs all over creation.

Respectfully, yours,

S. P. BYRNES.

Mr. HARRIS. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD an extract from the proceedings of the Farmers' Conference yesterday, appearing in the Baltimore Sun of this date.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Herbert Myrick, of Springfield, Mass., editor of Farm and Home, offered the amendment to the waterways report which recognized the Henry Ford offer for Muscle Shoals. The amendment, overwhelmingly adopted by the conference, read:

"To accomplish results without any further delay whatsoever we urge the Secretary of War and recommend that the Congress accept the Henry Ford proposal to take over the hydroelectric power and air-nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, under the guaranty to produce about the present maximum capacity of the plant, being 100,000 tons of ammonium nitrate annually, for 100 years, thus opening the Tennessee River to navigation, insuring the cheap production of fertilizer, metals, and commodities, and insuring the United States nitrogen in time of peace or war."

Mr. Myrick later exhibited a telegram from Henry Ford saying that his offer to do these things was ready for fulfillment.

Mr. HARRIS. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a press dispatch to the Baltimore Sun sent from Washington yesterday.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MUSCLE SHOALS' MERITS TOLD HOUSE COMMITTEE—CHIEF OF ORDNANCE OF ARMY TESTIFIES OF FITNESS TO MANUFACTURE NITRATES FOR WAR OR PEACE—FORD'S CONTRACT RECEIVED—WEEKS BELIEVED BY UNDERWOOD TO BE FAVORABLY INCLINED TO DETROIT MAN'S PLAN.

[From the Sun Bureau.]

WASHINGTON, January 27.

For the first time at this session of Congress the House Military Affairs Committee to-day entered upon a formal discussion of the great Muscle Shoals project and its future operation for war emergencies as well as commercial development.

Maj. Gen. Clarence C. Williams, Chief of Ordnance of the Army, a witness before the committee, told how readily the big plant on the Tennessee River could be adapted to either manufacture of high explosives for the national defense or for producing fertilizer for the agricultural interests.

WEEKS THOUGHT FAVORABLE.

Secretary of War Weeks told Senator UNDERWOOD that Mr. Ford's contract, brought back to-day from Detroit, where Mr. Ford signed it, would be sent to Congress next week, accompanied by a report on it from the Secretary. Mr. UNDERWOOD said he felt Secretary Weeks would give it a friendly indorsement.

There are two phases of the contract, it is said, which Secretary Weeks regrets—the absence of a definite guaranty for manufacture of the fertilizer and failure to fix the amount of capital which the company Mr. Ford agrees to create will have to finance the project.

Gen. Williams was subjected to a running fire of questions regarding Muscle Shoals. It was pointed out to the committee that the plant manufactures ammonium nitrate, and that it would require additional machinery to make ammonium sulphate, which is necessary for fertilizer.

"Do these nitrates deteriorate in explosive power?" asked Representative STOLL, of South Carolina.

WILL NOT DETERIORATE.

"No," replied Gen. Williams. "Not if they are properly housed. The ammonium nitrate and the T. N. T. will keep indefinitely."

"From the standpoint of preparedness," asked Representative FIELDS, of Kentucky, "it would be to the advantage of the Government to keep the plant in operation to its maximum, or at least a medium, average of production?"

"That would be an important step in preparedness," said Gen. Williams.

"Even if it were turned over to Mr. Ford or to any other bidder," said Chairman KAHN, "we still would have to do a great deal before we would begin to bring out nitrates for the Army."

"No, sir," said Gen. Williams, "not a great deal, because the largest part of the process is gone through in either case."

"But you would have to install some machinery?" insisted Chairman KAHN. "Have you figured on putting that machinery down there to be used in case of war?"

WAR MACHINERY THERE.

"That machinery," replied the general, "would not be used in case of war. The machinery there now is that which would be used in case of war."

"Nitrate plant No. 2," the general continued, "is the principal nitrogen-fixation plant which we have at Muscle Shoals. It has been operated sufficiently to demonstrate that it will produce the material it was built for and in the quantities it was designed for. The plant is now laid up 'in ordinary.' Only a few caretakers are there. Its disposition is pending."

"Including the cost of the land," Chairman KAHN stated, "the expenditure at Muscle Shoals has been $75,000,000, in round numbers, and the capacity of the plant is 110,000 tons of ammonium nitrate per annum."

WISCONSIN DELEGATES FAVOR FORD.

Nine of the eleven Members of the House from the Wisconsin delegation in a letter to Secretary Weeks stated that, in their opinion, the best interests of the country would be served by turning over the Muscle Shoals plants to Mr. Ford, provided his bid was reasonable.

"We feel that if Mr. Ford should acquire the plant," said the delegation, "his operation of it will result in greater benefit to the people of this country, and especially the farmers, than if acquired by other interests."

BONUS FOR EX-SOLDIERS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WILLIS) presented a resolution adopted by the Ohio-West Virginia Group Council Service Star Legion, favoring the enactment of the so-called five-point adjusted compensation bill for the relief of World War veterans, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 3080) granting an increase of pension to Charles A. Smith (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 3081) granting a pension to Mabel A. Tibbetts (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KELLOGG:

A bill (S. 3082) to amend the act approved August 24, 1921, entitled "An act to amend the war finance corporation act, approved April 5, 1918, as amended, to provide relief for producers of and dealers in agricultural products, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 3083) authorizing the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. to construct an elevated railroad siding adjacent to its tracks in the city of Washington; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

FEDERAL RESERVE BANK BUILDINGS IN NEW YORK CITY.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess——

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator yield to me? I wish to introduce a resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection, if there is to be no debate on it.

Mr. HEFLIN. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 228) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Whereas there have been confusing statements made in the press and in the Senate regarding the amount of money to be expended in the construction of the Federal reserve bank building or buildings in the city of New York; and

Whereas criticisms and complaints have been made regarding the manner in which the bids were obtained and the contract let for the construction of the said Federal reserve bank building or buildings: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Federal Reserve Board be, and it is hereby, directed to furnish, at its earliest convenience, to the Senate copies of all bids submitted and of the contract or contracts made for the construction of the proposed Federal reserve bank building or buildings in the city of New York.

RECESS.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock Monday.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 1 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until Monday, January 30, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 28, 1922.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, Thou who dwellest in the beauty of holiness, which no mortal can approach, Thou art all in all to us and other refuge have we none. We draw near to Thee as a merciful Father. We would have our lives dear to us only because of their relationship to Thee, to our homes, and to our country. Always give us power to cultivate the heavenly graces of charity and forgiveness. O, in the depths of our breasts may there be graves like unto long forgotten places to which no paths ever lead and there in endless and unbroken silence may there lie buried the wrongs we have suffered. If our hearts are tired, if our eyes are weary, if the yoke hurts, sanctify these experiences and restrain them. O give bread and shelter to the hungry and homeless; give health to those who are in affliction; give wisdom to those who are in perplexity; and when earth's door closes, to all of us eternal rest. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, with Mr. MANN in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9981, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is pending. The Clerk will again report it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent to amend the amendment by striking out the figures "$400,000" and inserting "$500,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to amend his amendment in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Page 28, after line 12, insert a new paragraph, as follows: "Of the sums appropriated in this act not more than $500,000 shall be used for advertising purposes."

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, $500,000 is a lot of money, and yet I have offered an amendment allowing the Shipping Board to spend up to $500,000 for advertising, not because I believe they ought to expend that much, but because it is a very small amount as compared with what they have spent for advertising, and it is a ridiculously small amount when compared with the amount they want to spend for advertising during the next fiscal year.

This Shipping Board has received lump-sum appropriations from the Congress ever since it was created. I served on the sundry civil subcommittee for two years during the war, having charge of the Shipping Board appropriation. I know that at that time there was no other way in which we could have appropriated for that organization except by making lump-sum appropriations. I did not like it then; now, in time of peace, I like it less.

From the day of its organization the Shipping Board has been subjected to criticism. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] said that it was "rotten." But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who conducted a most extensive investigation, did not reach that conclusion nor make such a report, but on the contrary said that there was extravagance. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts. From the day of its creation there has been great extravagance.

Now, the present management of the Shipping Board, appearing before the committee, informs us that they estimate that $938,000 was spent for advertising for the fiscal year 1920–21, of which amount approximately $366,000 was spent for passenger traffic advertising and $501,000 for freight advertising. In all, $938,000 was spent by the Shipping Board for advertising during the year 1920–21.

You have criticized the extravagance of that board during that period, and righteously so. You were justified in that criticism. It was too much money to spend for advertising. Now, I ask you whether, in this day of economy, you are going to allow this board, which you have criticized for extravagance for spending $938,000, spend during the next fiscal year nearly twice that amount, or $1,715,000.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I was not present in the Hall when the gentleman began. Has the gentleman offered an amendment to reduce the amount?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I have offered an amendment which seeks to limit to $500,000 the amount that the Shipping Board can expend for advertising next year.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I will.

Mr. SWEET. Was this advertising paid out of $48,500,000 that we appropriated in the last bill?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. It is impossible for me to answer, for this reason: The Shipping Board has received money, available for expenditure, from several sources. We reported $48,500,000 in a deficiency bill, and in the last regular appropriation bill we authorized them to use the proceeds of sales of assets. Now, if you will look in the hearings you will find out that the Shipping Board this year will spend——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If you will look in the hearings you will find that Mr. Lasker says that the Shipping Board will spend this year, not $48,500,000 or $100,000,000, but $310,000,000, so that it is impossible for me to segregate the particular fund from which it will come. But this amount can be expended——

Mr. SWEET. That has been expended without a specific authorization for advertising?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes; because there was no specific authorization for anything.

Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] says we should not "hamstring" the Shipping Board. If any organization has ever been turned loose with authority to spend money without limit, it is the Shipping Board. They will spend this year $310,000,000. They have a right to do it. There was no limit placed upon it. I come before you now and give you the only opportunity you will have to express an opinion as to the advertising expenditure that is deemed advisable.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. If this is a great business institution, does not the gentleman think it is profitable to advertise?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Certainly, to advertise; and the extent to which you advertise is a matter that we as business men must determine. The extent to which I suggest that this advertising be limited is to $500,000, and I want to go on and show why. If you will look at page 1131 of the hearings you will find that the United States Shipping Board proposes a budget, and they propose to expend for passenger and freight advertising $1,450,000. On page 1132 you will find that they propose to expend for advertising for sales and other purposes $265,000, making the total expenditure for advertising for the Shipping Board for the next fiscal year, unless you place some limit upon them, $1,715,000.

The question is whether that is an expenditure which we should authorize. I say that last year this Shipping Board, a business organization which Congress has long since determined was an extravagant organization, expended $938,000, $366,000 of which was for passenger advertising. This year this economical board proposes to spend for advertising $1,715,000, of which $900,000 is for passenger advertising, and the question before us is, as business men, Shall we authorize it?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I am sorry I can not yield. Now, in order to ascertain whether that is wise, let me call the attention of gentlemen to this fact: The seven lines doing business in America had a total expenditure for advertising in 1920 of only $695,000. The expenditure for all of the seven lines put together amounted to only $695,000. Yet the Shipping Board proposes to spend $1,715,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the gentleman know how many ships these seven lines were running?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I do not know that. I wish I could tell the gentleman, but I know that all the other lines put together expect to spend that much, and they must have more ships than the Shipping Board. Now, I do not for a moment make any criticism of the motives of the gentleman in charge of this advertising; but I know this: That if any organization of this Government comes to Congress asking for anything, we always allow for the enthusiasm of the man in charge of the department.

In charge of the Shipping Board now is a man whose business is advertising. It is natural that a man should have his own business as a hobby, that he should unduly emphasize its importance. So we find that where formerly we had an advertising man in the Shipping Board drawing $4,000, as soon as Mr. Lasker took charge he put in an advertising man and paid him $9,000 a year, and he immediately gave out a contract to place advertising. This $9,000 man does not place the advertising, but he gave out a contract to the Gundlach Advertising Agency to place this advertising. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] put into the RECORD the other day some figures, which have not yet been denied, showing that for placing these advertisements this agency was to receive 10 per cent. If they place $900,000 worth, you will see what they get.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Fifteen per cent.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That is worse.

Mr. LONDON. Do they get that from the Government?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The Shipping Board pays this advertising agency 15 per cent for placing the advertising, because it is always included in the amount charged by the magazine or newspaper. Knowing they have to pay the 15 per cent, they must add it to their bills. Then, in addition, he said they get a 5 per cent discount for cash, and the Government furnishes the cash, so as to allow the agency to pay cash to the newspapers and magazines and get the 5 per cent discount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. So you can figure for yourselves what this agency is going to get out of this $900,000 allotment for passenger advertising. The 15 per cent alone will amount to $135,000. Now, there is not a man on this floor who would vote for that if it was submitted to him as a direct proposition to authorize the expenditure of $1,715,000. But the appeal will be made to you that you should not put on this limitation, because by so doing you are hamstringing the Shipping Board. That appeal was made yesterday by my friend from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. But I call attention to this so that you will remember it when any man makes that appeal here, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is the only man who has put a limitation upon the Shipping Board. He put a limitation on them that they should not have more than six officers or employees drawing salaries of over $11,000. Did that hamstring them? On the contrary, the Shipping Board reports to Congress to-day that they have in their employ the very same men who before that time were drawing $20,000 or $18,000 or $15,000. The very same men are serving them to-day and are accepting the $11,000.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] saved to the Treasury thousands of dollars by his limitation, and that shows the effectiveness, and not the ineffectiveness, of the limitation. He also placed upon the bill the very wise limitation that no lawyer should be employed except with the approval of the Attorney General; and all that I now ask is that you place a limitation upon the natural enthusiasm of an advertising man to emphasize unduly the importance of the business in which he has been engaged and thereby spend $1,715,000. In a business corporation the officers and board of directors would restrain the euthusiasm of the advertising agent. Here the agent is at the head of the organization and you alone can restrain him.

One thing more. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] called attention to the fact yesterday that the passenger traffic on the North American lines was so crowded that if any of you gentlemen wanted to get passage on any of those ships you would have to make application a long time in advance in order to get booked. If that is so, why is it not a good time to cut down on this passenger advertising instead of increasing it from $366,000 for 1920–21 to $900,000 for the next fiscal year? [Applause.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from South Carolina urges, amongst other things in support of his amendment, that Mr. Lasker is an enthusiast because he is an advertising man himself. To my mind the fact that Mr. Lasker is an advertising man, who is thoroughly conversant with the advertising business, should have some weight in the determination of the amount of money that should be allowed for this purpose. I believe that there is not a man living in the United States to-day who knows the value of advertising and how to place it to greater advantage than Mr. Lasker does. He has made a wonderful success at that business and has reduced it to a science. If you will read the hearings and what he has to say with reference to the manner in which he finds out the value of this advertising, I think you will have a different opinion than that entertained by the gentleman from South Carolina. It does look like the amount asked for here of one million and some thousands of dollars is a considerable sum for advertising, but the advertiser to-day is the man who succeeds. I think that the newspapers of this country can well afford to build a monument as high as the Washington Monument in memory of P. T. Barnum, who first demonstrated the value of advertising. I want to call your attention to the fact that this shipping business of ours—it is our business—is the biggest business in the world. There are 82 of these services, and before this debate is through I will put in the RECORD a statement of where they are located and the countries from and to which they extend, as follows:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION,
INTEROFFICE MEMORANDUM,
January 24, 1922.

From: W. J. Love, vice president, in charge of traffic.
To: R. Sollitt, assistant to chairman.
Subject: Referring to conversation of this morning, this is to advise that we are presently maintaining 87 services.

Twenty of the principal services are listed below:

New York to Piræus, Saloniki, Smyrna, and Constantinople.
Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York to Genoa, Naples, Barcelona, and Marseille.
New York to Rio, Montevideo, and Buenos Aires.
New Orleans, Gulfport, Pensacola, and Galveston to Brazil and Plate.
Pacific coast ports to Porto Rico and east coast South America.
New York to West Indies and Caribbean ports.
San Francisco and Los Angeles to Honolulu, Yokohama, Kobe, Shanghai, Manila, and Hongkong.
New York and other Atlantic ports to Yokohama, Kobe, Shanghai, Hongkong, and Manila.
Puget Sound to Yokohama, Kobe, Dairen, Shanghai, Hongkong, and Manila.
Columbia River to Yokohama, Kobe, Dairen, Shanghai, Hongkong, and Manila.
New York to Cherbourg, Plymouth, and Bremen.
New York and Philadelphia to Scandinavia and Baltic.
New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore to French Atlantic.
New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, and Newport News to Antwerp and Rotterdam.
New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore to Hamburg and Bremen.
New Orleans to Liverpool and Manchester.
Galveston to Liverpool and Manchester.
New Orleans to French Atlantic.
Galveston and Texas City to French Atlantic.
Wilmington, Charleston, and Jacksonville to United Kingdom.

As an indication of what our vessels have been doing recently in six services selected at random, please note below:

Baltimore, Philadelphia, and New York to Genoa, Naples, Barcelona, and Marseille:
Gross revenue	$57,000
Expenses	55,000
New Orleans to Liverpool and Manchester:
Gross revenue	40,000
Expenses	45,000
New York to Hamburg and Bremen:
Gross revenue	38,000
Expenses	35,000
New York to French Atlantic ports:
Gross revenue	30,000
Expenses	37,000
San Francisco and Los Angeles to Orient:
Gross revenue	75,000
Expenses	99,000
New York to Australia:
Gross revenue	100,000
Expenses	180,000

W. J. LOVE,
Vice President, in Charge of Traffic.

Our shipping is a comparatively new business. We did not have any when the war broke out. Whatever we have now was built up during the period of the war and since that time. There are competitive lines all over the world traveling these same routes, and by reason of their long years of existence, and by reason of their advertising they have become known far better than ours, and they are far more advanced than ours, because of the fact that people are all creatures of circumstance and habit. We patronize the grocery store where we have been treated well. We patronize the dry goods store where we have been treated nicely, and it is through advertising that the public mind is converted from the old accustomed habit of doing business. So that if this concern of ours is to compete with all these other carrying vessels we must of necessity make some exertion in that direction. I call your attention to what some of these competitive companies are doing: In 1914, up to August 1, the Hamburg-American Line was expending for publication space and printed literature in America alone $770,000 a year. How much the aggregate of the Hamburg-American advertising expenditure amounted to for all its lines around the globe I do not know, but it is fair to suppose that it was many times $770,000. Now, there was an appropriation last year of a million and some odd thousand dollars for the purpose of advertising, not in America alone but for advertising all over the globe, all around the globe, for we have our vessels plying the seven seas, going to every important port upon the face of the earth. So you will see that the amount of money asked for in this bill is moderate as compared to the Hamburg-American Line's expenditure for this purpose. Yet our concern is a bigger concern that that, and we ought to do more of the carrying, especially to and from America, than the Hamburg-American Line does.

I desire to call your attention to some other figures that may be illuminating: The approximate expenditures of the Hamburg-American Line in 1913 for newspaper and magazine space in America was $500,000; of the Cunard Line, $350,000—this is for advertising in America alone, remember; the other British lines, $400,000; the French line, $500,000; the Lampert & Holt Line, $45,000; the Holland-America Line $65,000. So, if you will compare this expenditure with the amount of money asked for in this bill it is not much as compared with the money that is being expended by the competing lines. The only way you can arrive at any intelligent conclusion with reference to such matters is by comparison. Now, if we are to continue in this business, or if we are to go out of this business, is it not wise to conduct the business so that when we do get out we can get out to some advantage? If these people are attracted to the American Line it is going to be by some sort of an inducement to distract them from the other lines that they are accustomed to patronize. That is the purpose of this advertising. I will tell you how they are doing it. Mr. Lasker has laid his cards on the table, so that anybody can see the plan, and he gets dollar for dollar in results for every dollar of advertising that he expends.

If he is advertising in a country newspaper in California, or in Alabama, or in South Carolina, and there is a report comes in to the Shipping Board with reference to the rates that a given line makes for a given trip, they certify where they get their information, so that they can check back to the newspaper in which they are making the advertising, or the magazine, so that they may know whether they are getting value received for the advertising in that particular periodical or newspaper. If they find they are not getting value received, then they strike it off. Then, through this experimentation it is made possible for them to know exactly what they do get. This advertising business is a pretty big business. I confess that I do not know much about it, but through the wonderful experience of this man Lasker, who knows more about the advertising business than anything else, he is bringing returns to the Shipping Board.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any figures showing what these competing companies are expending for advertising at the present time?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. In 1920 the publication expenditures on other lines in America were as follows—this is for one year: The Cunard Line, $200,000; the I. M. M. Line, $300,000; the French Line, $75,000; the I. K. K., $50,000; the Holland-American, $35,000; the Lamport & Holt Line, $25,000; and the United American, $10,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is a total of a little more than $695,000 for advertising in America alone by these competing companies that the American Shipping Board has to compete with. They are old established lines, and were in existence before any Member here was born, and we are trying to place the American Shipping Board and its transportation facilities upon the ocean in competition in such a way that it may be made profitable if possible. That is the purpose of this, and it is not right to hamstring this thing by reason of cutting off this advertising. It is up to you to do it. I confess that I do not know anything about this business. This advertising business has been reduced to an exact science, and if we can not depend upon the acknowledged advertising authority in this country for our guidance, upon what may we depend? I do not want to set my judgment up against a man who knows something about this business. I do not know anything about it. I do not think there is anyone here as an individual who knows anything about it.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Recurring to the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN] several days ago, Is the man who issued that publicity statement a part of the advertising force? I refer to the publicity statement with reference to a social function.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, no; that man has not anything to do with it, and I will say in passing that this was just the same as if somebody in the gentleman's office was appealed to with reference to a social function, and was asked to give the names and a description of the dresses of the ladies, and so forth. He did it and happened to write it upon this kind of paper. It was a pure incident and had nothing to do with the Shipping Board.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Of course he was a $5,000 employee of the Shipping Board and a former newspaper man. Unquestionably he is connected with the division of information, because his communication came out on the official paper of the division of information of the Shipping Board, and he had all to do with it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And if the gentleman from Massachusetts were asked to give some of the names of those who attended a social function at his house or at his friend's house, obliging, as he always is with these newspaper men, as we all desire to be, he would give them the information, no doubt, and he would write it on his congressional paper.

Mr. GALLIVAN. But what I read to the House was a revised copy, to be released on a certain day, and it was not asked for in advance. In fact, the newspapers were told that they must not print it until the day after the social function was held and the Ophelia roses were gathered together to decorate the table. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say to the committee that we have bigger things to consider than these trifles. That is a mere trifle.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman stated that he has great confidence in Mr. Lasker as an advertising man.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. And the committee has placed this sum at $900,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is $1,700,000.

Mr. SWEET. Is that the full amount that he asked for?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; it is not.

Mr. SWEET. How much did he ask for?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It may be the full amount, but I do not think it is. It is the full amount that came to us, but I think it is not the full amount that he asked of the Budget. We were convinced that the gentleman knew what he was talking about.

Mr. SWEET. Then the committee took the judgment of the Budget rather than the judgment of Mr. Lasker on this advertising matter.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We took the judgment of Mr. Lasker, and we took also the judgment of the Budget. It is the purpose of the Budget and it is the purpose of this committee to be as economical as possible, and we have reduced this bill below the recommendations of the Budget very nearly $10,000,000; but this is one of the items that we did not feel we were justified in reducing for the reason that the gentleman made such a good case before us, and I think every member of the committee was convinced that we would not be doing what was best for the interests of the Shipping Board and our vessels upon the sea if we reduced this item for advertising.

Mr. WASON. Does the gentleman recall that in our investigation we were informed that last month in response to passenger "ads" they had 12,000 inquiries to answer?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is a fact, and that is one of the demonstrations of how the results come from this advertising, and how they check back against the paper or the periodical in which they are making the advertisements to ascertain whether or not it is bringing results.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER On how many of the 80 trade routes are we maintaining a passenger traffic?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think the minutes disclose the number, but I wish to insert as a part of my remarks some of the principal trade routes that are now maintained. Twenty of them are listed here.

Mr. OLIVER. On which passenger traffic is maintained?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Twenty of the principal services are listed in those remarks, but I do not think it is disclosed whether or not they are all passenger or part passenger and part freight.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the gentleman happen to recall how many passenger vessels are being operated by the Shipping Board?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not. The minutes disclose that. This is one of the biggest investigations before our committee.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not find it in the hearings.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They have about 440 vessels of all kinds in operation on these 80 routes and some——

Mr. OLIVER. What percentage of that number are passenger vessels?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, I do not know.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the gentleman happen to know whether it is the policy of the board to advertise for cargo vessels or only passenger vessels?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, on that proposition I desire to call attention to what Mr. Love says upon that proposition:

Mr. LOVE. Of the $938,000 which it is estimated was spent for advertising by the Shipping Board during the fiscal year 1920–21—the records are so bad that I can vouch for no figures—considerably more than half is chargeable to freight advertising, or approximately $521,000. Passenger advertising consumed, as near as can be determined, $366,000, while advertising of ships and materials, the production of a motion-picture film, and the cost of an advertising survey accounted for the balance.

For the coming year it is proposed, roughly, to reverse this appropriation, spending a relatively large sum on passenger advertising. A total appropriation of $900,000 on the tentative basis outlined above is requested, this appropriation to be divided as follows:

United States Lines	$400,000
Munson Line	240,000
Pacific Mail	140,000
Admiral Line	120,000

The appropriations are to cover not only publication advertising in this country but whatever foreign advertising is done and the preparation of all posters, follow-up literature, etc.

This is a thing to which I wish to call attention. Not all of this appropriation is being consumed in advertising for either passenger carrying or for freight, but there will be of necessity a great amount of advertising for the sale of property, and I think this allocation goes into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The amount is $500,000 for freight and $900,000 for passenger.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. So when you are considering this thing you should have in mind that all of this appropriation is not for the purpose of advertising the carrying of passengers or the carrying of freight. We have all over this world where there are human habitations property that must be disposed of, and much of it at a loss, most of it at a loss.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the Byrnes amendment limiting the amount that can be spent for advertising to $500,000. I recall that Chairman MADDEN pleaded with us with his usual force not to hamstring the Shipping Board. I do not like to hamstring the Shipping Board and I do not like to occupy the position of attempting to hamstring the Shipping Board; but if you allow them to spend more than $700,000 to advertise their ships they are not going to meet with the success that that amount of money would ordinarily bring to them through their advertising for passengers to go on ships. This board and its ships have been hamstrung by the Volstead law; our fellow citizens will not sail on "dry" ships when they can get a "wet" one; and you could give them twice what is estimated for on this budget of theirs and they can not get the people to travel on their ships. What is the use of disguising that fact? That is the trouble we have got to face, and we might as well admit it. With the expenditure for advertising of $1,700,000 they would not get the number of passengers that all the other private lines will get with a total expenditure of only $600,000, and they will never get what the chairman of the Shipping Board is now hoping to get, a fair portion of the immigration which is coming to this country, because the immigrants' personal habits are interfered with on the Shipping Board vessels, and it is repugnant to ordinary human beings wherever they are born, to have their personal habits interfered with.

Mr. CABLE. If the gentleman will permit, would not the immigrants rather come on American ships than not come at all?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I suppose that is true, that rather than not come at all, if that is the only chance they would have, namely, to come on these boats, as a last resort they would come in Shipping Board vessels; but that is no argument, in my judgment. The whole trouble is that the Shipping Board is hamstrung by Volsteadism; and I dare say it is hoped that by this enormous expenditure of money to overcome the handicap which the Volstead law has put on our American Shipping Board ships. Most of this enormous sum of money will not bring results, and every man who listens to me and is familiar with conditions knows that I am telling facts. Why run away from them?

Now, something was said about two hundred thousand and odd dollars being spent in advertising the sale of surplus material. I do not want to reduce that amount. But there is a general objection, whenever it is known in this country that nine hundred thousand and odd dollars was spent in advertising these ships, in these hard times, to permitting the Shipping Board to spend even that sum in another year, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has advised the House that they are purposing to spend twice as much. I hope the Byrnes amendment will carry. We ought to let these reformers in the new Shipping Board learn that there are some reforms they have overlooked; here is a wonderful opportunity to effect a wholesome saving and stop a needless waste of the people's money. If the members of the new Shipping Board have the brains and patriotism and devotion to the people's interest attributed to them, here is a chance for them to show some of us who are listed as doubting Thomases.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am in favor of the pending amendment. Something was said on yesterday about hamstringing the Shipping Board in its operations of the ships owned by the Government. I am quite sure that there is no one in the House who desires to hamstring the Shipping Board. As a matter of fact, under this bill the House is asked to appropriate more than $100,000,000, by way of a lump sum, in addition to all of the receipts that may come to the Shipping Board as a result of the operations of the boats now being operated. As was stated by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] a while ago, more than $300,000,000 was expended during the last year, according to Mr. Lasker, by the Shipping Board. I submit that, in view of the record made by the present administration of the Shipping Board, in the way of unprecedented increase of salaries paid out of this lump sum, Congress is entirely justified in placing certain limitations upon the appropriations made in this bill.

Now, it has been stated that the chairman of the Shipping Board, by way of explanation of his estimates, told the committee that he proposed to expend $1,715,000 during the year 1923 for advertisements. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] says that the chairman of the Shipping Board knows a great deal about advertising; that he is greatly impressed with its value. That is true. I am sure we are all impressed with the value of advertising. But the very fact that the chairman of the Shipping Board made his reputation and his fortune through advertising, perhaps gives him a somewhat exaggerated idea.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. What has been the appropriation heretofore for advertising?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was about to say there has never been a direct appropriation for advertising, because this money is appropriated in lump sum, with full authority on the part of the Shipping Board to spend it just as it sees fit, and, as a matter of fact, even though the chairman stated he was expecting to spend $1,715,000 during the year 1923 for advertising, there is no limitation in this bill. The sky is the limit in so far as advertising is concerned. He may expend that amount or may expend several million dollars if he chooses.

Now, I had something to say the other day in regard to the advertising of the Shipping Board. It was stated, and it has not been denied, that this advertising largely has been placed in the hands of the Gundlach Advertising Agency. It was said that Mr. Gundlach conducted a rather small advertising business in the city of Chicago, with a small office in the city of New York. The gentleman from Indiana stated that he then proposed to place in the RECORD a statement by way of explanation of the contracts made with the Gundlach Advertising Agency. Up to this time he has not done so. But he stated at that time during the three months beginning October 1 and ending December 31, 1921, $125,505 had been turned over to the Gundlach Advertising Agency for advertising purposes, and upon which the Gundlach Advertising Agency received commissions amounting to over $18,800. If it is true that in that length of time the Gundlach Agency has made over $18,800; at the same rate during the entire year the agency will reap something more than $75,000 for its advertising services. But that is not all. The contract made with the Gundlach Advertising Agency provides that that agency is to receive 15 per cent upon the work of ad setting, making of halftones, art work, electrotypes, and the usual similar items. No statement is made as to just how much the advertising agency will earn under that part of its contract.

Now, I want to call your attention to this: The statement made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] says that during those three months $125,500 was expended by the Gundlach Advertising Agency. It is true that the statement is made that over $18,800 was received by way of commissions from magazines and periodicals in which the advertisements have been carried, but you and I know full well that the newspapers and periodicals always add all commissions paid to the actual cost of the advertising. So, after all, the Federal Government paid the $18,800 by way of commission to the Gundlach Advertising Agency. Now, that advertising could not have covered the entire three months or could not have commenced on October 1, unless the contract was made with the Gundlach Advertising Agency at least 30 or, possibly, 60 days in advance. You know, as a matter of fact, that the agency could not have placed its contracts, it could not have prepared its copy, without a period of 30 or 60 days prior to the time the advertisements began.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. So the statement made by the gentleman from Indiana at the instance of the chairman of the Shipping Board is singularly silent as to just what commissions have been paid to this advertising agency, even during this period of three months. We do not know whether it was for three months or whether it was for 30 days or 60 days that this advertising was actually done and these large commissions paid, because I submit that the chairman of the Shipping Board could not have known at the time that statement was made as to all the advertisements during the latter part of December, because the accounts could not possibly have been received.

Now, I submit, gentlemen, that in view of the fact that $938,000 was expended in 1921, and that the chairman of the Shipping Board states to the committee that he proposes to expend $1,715,000 at least during the year 1923, Congress is justified in placing and should place some limitation upon the amount that is to be expended for that purpose.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER. The advertising is really for the purpose of keeping the losses within $50,000,000, because that is the amount you appropriate in a lump sum to cover the deficit from operation during 1923?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is correct.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. SNYDER. What is the output of advertising that this money is spent for? What is the necessity of art work in the advertising that you speak of?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman will have to ask somebody that knows more about advertising than I do.

Mr. SNYDER. I know a little something about advertising, but I do not understand what all this money is needed for, unless it is for the sale of the ships or advertising the routes that the steamships sail on, for passenger purposes, and so on. Advertising the art work must be for embellishing the interiors of the ships that carry a very few people, over which we have no control.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I fancy the gentleman is correct in that statement.

Mr. SNYDER. I think the gentleman is absolutely correct in his statement that the money that was spent in advertising in those three months must have been contracted for previous to the expenditure on October 1 if there was much art work to be done in the advertising.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Undoubtedly, because it would necessarily take some length of time to prepare the advertising.

Mr. SNYDER. You say that the contract provided for 15 per cent to be paid to this agency that has the contract to place the advertising. Is it shown anywhere in the hearings the amount the advertising company gets from the periodicals and newspaper companies for placing advertisements with them?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The statement was made that the $18,800 came by way of commission from the newspapers and periodicals, but, as I have said, that is really a charge upon the Treasury, because, of course, we know the newspapers and periodicals added the commissions in their charge for advertising.

Mr. SNYDER. My thought is that Mr. Lasker, perhaps being the largest advertising medium in the country, ought to be able to establish in his own department a bureau of advertising that would not cost anything like the amount that is being paid to these fellows that are doing this advertising.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think that will occur to anyone who thinks of it.

Mr. SNYDER. And there is no question but that 15 per cent is entirely out of order and much more than is paid by anyone else who advertises with these people.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The Shipping Board now has an advertising department within the board. Formerly, during the old administration, Mr. Lane was the advertising manager, and he received $4,000 a year. At present Mr. M. D. Claussen is head of this department and is receiving $9,000. He has an assistant, I think, who receives $241 a month, besides other employees, making the cost of his office $27,500 a year. In addition to that, there is a publicity agent who receives $6,000, so that, as a matter of fact, the Government is now paying $33,500 to employees within the Shipping Board, who are expected to give their attention to advertising.

Now, I entirely agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER] that the Shipping Board, especially since it is now headed by a man so familiar with the advertising game, ought to be able to do that work itself, and save this 15 per cent on this immense sum that is being expended for advertising purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That is an example of Government operation, is it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last three words.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] the other day called attention to what is known as the Gundlach contract, and has said that up to this time no denial had been made in regard to the extravagant charges made with reference to this advertising. I have before me a letter received from Mr. Lasker which I desire to read upon that proposition. I have also the Gundlach contract, and the net result of its operation, which shows that it is very materially different from the assertions that have been made here. I will read first the letter that has been sent to me:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
OFFICE OF THE CHAIRMAN,
Washington, January 19, 1922.

Hon. WILL R. WOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: I have just been informed that the inclosed article from the New York Evening World was to be read on the floor of Congress during the debate on the Shipping Board appropriation. I had not seen the article until this evening. If the matter comes up, I will be grateful if you will read this statement on the floor should you deem it wise so to do.

Everything in the article is untrue from beginning to end.

The Gundlach Advertising Co. is an active competitor of the firm of Lord & Thomas, which latter firm I control. The Shipping Board is undertaking to sell passenger tickets by mail and thereby make the advertising pay for itself. I selected the Gundlach Co. largely because it is the leading mail-order advertising agency of Chicago, and it is with the work of the advertising agencies in that city, though competitors of mine, that I am best acquainted.

The full statement of our advertising can be found in the record we made before your subcommittee.

Mr. Brundage came to the Shipping Board in order to help me get the unbelievable confusion in its advertising affairs, which I found awaiting me, straightened out, and I asked him to temporarily undertake the work of reorganizing that department until I could get a permanent appointee. The opening of a London office for Lord & Thomas, long contemplated, was delayed for two months by me in order that Mr. Brundage might do this work for the Shipping Board. He was not in the employ of Lord & Thomas at the time he came with the Shipping Board, though it was then contemplated that he would open a London office for that firm. Mr. Brundage served the Shipping Board at a much smaller salary than Lord & Thomas is paying him in London.

The Gundlach Advertising Co. receives the regular commission paid all first-class advertising agencies by all advertisers, and the editor of the World, if he had the remotest interest in verity and decency, could have ascertained that fact by merely communicating with his own advertising department.

My financial and personal interest in the Gundlach Agency is exactly the same as that of the New York World in the New York American. I have not one penny's interest, direct or indirect, in the Gundlach Advertising Co.; on the contrary, as stated above, they are active competitors of Lord & Thomas. They are doing splendid work for the Shipping Board.

For your information, should you need them, I am inclosing the article referred to, the report of the advertising department from July 1, 1920, to December 31, 1921, which shows the great confusion in its affairs when the present board took hold and the progress that has been made; a copy of the letter authorizing the Gundlach Agency to do the work it is now doing for us, and the statement of the moneys paid the Gundlach Agency on advertising since it started the work under the letter referred to.

Sincerely, yours,

A. D. LASKER, Chairman.

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, September 28, 1921.

GUNDLACH ADVERTISING AGENCY,
175 Fifth Avenue, New York.

GENTLEMEN: This supersedes the letter of authorization written you September 17, 1921.

You are hereby authorized as from September 17, 1921, and until further notice, to act as an agent of the United States Shipping Board in the preparation and placing of advertising, under terms and conditions as follows:

You will render regular advertising agency service, consisting of the preparation of copy, art work, and completed advertisements, and will oversee the mechanical production of such work, forward orders to publishers in accordance with estimates and schedules O. K'd by the Shipping Board advertising department, pay the publishers' bills, check the insertion of advertisements, and bill the Shipping Board for these services.

For advertising in periodicals by which you are allowed agency commission, you will charge the Shipping Board the regular published gross rate as shown on publishers' rate card, giving the Shipping Board the benefit of such cash discounts as the publishers allow you, providing your bills are paid by the Shipping Board within the cash discount date as specified in your invoice. For advertising in periodicals by which you are not allowed an agency commission you will charge the Shipping Board the regular published gross rate as shown on publishers' rate card, giving the Shipping Board the benefit of such cash discounts as the publishers allow you, providing your bills are paid by the Shipping Board within the cash discount date as specified in your invoices, except that you will charge the Shipping Board a service fee of 15 per cent above the net amount which you pay the publishers.

Your handling of mechanical production will include such work as ad setting, making of half tones, electrotypes, and the usual similar items. This mechanical work you will charge for at the net cost to you plus a service fee of 15 per cent, except that you will not charge a service fee on the cost of the paper stock and press run for circulars, posters, or other direct items, the Shipping Board to get the benefit of such cash discounts as you secure from the firms who perform the actual operations. This basis of charge and payment applies also to the making of art work.

It is understood, however, that if extra service work, such as the writing of booklets or other direct material, becomes a continuous and considerable expense to you—a burden disproportionate to the sum you are earning on commissions from publication advertising—you are to take up with us the matter of making service charges for this work.

Yours, truly,

D. E. BRUNDAGE,
Advertising Manager.

Approved:

RALPH V. SOLLITT,
Special Assistant to the Chairman.

Approved:

N. A. SMYTH,
Assistant General Counsel.

Now I want to call your attention to this Gundlach contract. I read:

Total amount of advertising placed through Gundlach from October 1 to December 31—three months—$125,505.40. (See p. 1 of report of the advertising department, United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, from July 1, 1920, to Dec. 31, 1921.)

Commission paid by newspapers and magazines on above amount to Gundlach, $18,825.81.

During the same period the above agency received less than $200 from us, representing 15 per cent commission provided for in last part of paragraph 4 on page 1 of advertising contract attached.

In this period—three months—the amount paid the Gundlach Agency under paragraph 1, page 2, of the Gundlach Advertising Agency contract was $268.74.

Of the $18,825.81 paid by the publications as commission to the Gundlach Agency, it cost that agency approximately 66⅔ per cent to do business, leaving it a profit of about 5 per cent on the total amount of money handled by them for three months' work, $6,275.27.

The Government has had returned to it in cash discounts during this time $2,510.10, which sum paid 50 per cent of the salaries of the advertising department of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation during that period.

The total amount returned to the Government in cash discounts during the 15 months prior to the contract with the Gundlach Agency probably did not exceed $500.

REPORT OF THE ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT, UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD EMERGENCY FLEET CORPORATION, FROM JULY 1, 1920, TO DECEMBER 31, 1921.

The fifth annual report of the United States Shipping Board contains, on pages 77 and 78, the following report of the advertising department for the fiscal year ending July 30, 1921:

"The department was organized first as a bureau of information, later supervising the conduct of advertising work similar to that carried on by commercial organizations.

"The initial activity in this line was a country-wide advertising survey, for which the board appropriated $50,000. The work was done by a very large group of advertising agencies, the final cost being less than $8,000. Following this survey, a country-wide campaign in daily newspapers was conducted, at a cost of $75,000. This was a general campaign exploiting the passenger and freight services of the board. A separate similar campaign costing $20,000 was conducted through national magazines. Other freight and passenger advertising was placed direct by the department in newspapers, trade papers, and marine publications, at a total cost of approximately $66,000.

"Passenger and freight advertising of the individual operators of Shipping Board vessels was supervised by the department, the costs being approximately $630,000.

"The department supervised the preparation and placing of advertising campaigns for the disposal of surplus ships, shipyards, material, housing projects, and for the purchase of bunker coal, fuel, and lubricating oils, supplies, etc., at a total advertising cost of about $100,000.

"The department arranged for and supervised the production of a series of motion pictures. The cost for this enterprise was approximately $31,000. Total, $930,000."

On July 28, 1921, four weeks after the end of the fiscal year, the resignation of the advertising manager was accepted and the new advertising manager assumed charge the same day. One of the first problems he had to contend with was the checking and paying of between 600 and 700 vouchers for advertising, representing approximately $200,000. Many of these vouchers were months overdue. Extra help was employed, and the greater part of the vouchers were checked and paid within the next 30 days. The records show that the former advertising manager had requested additional help in order to enable him to keep up with the work of his department, but his requests were not allowed.

The second problem was to reorganize the advertising department on a business basis in order that the Government could discount its bills and benefit by the cash discount.

The third problem was a study of the passenger situation and the preparation of a plan for advertising passenger vessels owned by the Government and operated by the United States Lines, Munson Line, Pacific Mail Steamship Co., and the Admiral Line in order that these vessels might properly compete with the old-established lines. As a result of this work the attached "Recommendations of the advertising department, covering advertising for the period from October 1, 1921, to October 1, 1922," was prepared and submitted to the board. This plan is now being followed.

By adopting a system of "reply coupons," which give an accurate record of the cost per inquiry in each publication used, with the ultimate object of retaining only such publications as produce business at a cost which is considered profitable, an accurate check on the advertising is obtained. As a result of the advertising under this system, started November 6 and up to and including December 10, when the last piece of copy was placed, there were received 11,672 inquiries for transportation, as follows:

United States Lines	7,848
Munson Line	3,351
Admiral Line	301
Pacific Mail Steamship Co	172

An analysis of the first 2,750 inquiries showed that about one-third were certain that they would make the trip, and the number of people going per inquiry was on an average of two. Using these figures as a basis, we have as a result of our advertising secured approximately 23,342 prospects, of which 8,000 state that they are certain of going abroad. To figure these at the conservative rate of $300 per passenger, for the outward trip only, shows a possible income of $2,400,000, at an expenditure of $66,577 for advertising, exclusive of the cost of timetables, advertising, and booklets.

At the present rate inquires are being received, and taking into consideration the proposed advertising and circularizing plans for the next two months, it is not unlikely that we shall have a list in Washington of close to 50,000 names of prospective travelers. It is gratifying to note from the letters accompanying the coupons received that the sentiment of the writers shows a strong desire to patronize American ships.

The fourth problem was to secure for the Government the services of a competent advertising agency. Newspapers and magazines allow advertising agencies, through whom they receive about 95 per cent of the national advertising, a commission averaging about 15 per cent for the service which the advertising agency renders to the advertiser. The newspapers and magazines, however, will not allow this discount to the advertiser where the business is placed direct with them by the advertiser. All established steamship lines, foreign and domestic, employ advertising agents who render valuable service without cost to the advertiser, and for that reason it was deemed necessary to secure the services of an advertising agency in order to do business on the same footing as that of our competitors.

On November 15 the advertising manager, Mr. D. E. Brundage, resigned and was succeeded by Mr. M. B. Claussen.

It is a recognized fact that the names of patrons and prospective travelers are the lifeblood of a steamship organization. Taking this as a basis, there has been established in Washington a central circularizing department, with a master list and units in the offices of each of the operators wherein are recorded the names of all prospects secured for the various lines through advertising, circularizing, and personal inquiry. It is the object of this department in advertising and circularizing to secure within the next three months the names of every possible traveler in the United States in order that they may be solicited to travel on American ships.

The plan of freight advertising was authorized under General Order No. 75, authorizing operators to advertise. (Copy attached.) It was later superseded by General Order No. 112, April, 1921, directing the operators to first submit their recommendations to the advertising manager for his approval. (Copy attached.) This order is still in existence, but a plan is now under consideration and is being worked out whereby the control of the amount allotted to each operator will be on the basis of so many cents per hundred tons per annum, which, in connection with a central circularizing department, is expected to increase the volume of business of the operators and decrease the amount which has heretofore been spent by the operators in newspapers and magazines for advertising.

As to the disposal of surplus material, the method pursued prior to July 1, 1921, in regard to advertising, was to place the copy with the publications direct, entailing a great deal of expense in issuing orders and checking the publications, all of which required considerable time and made it impossible for the Government to deduct the 2 per cent which is allowed for the prompt payment of the bills within 10 days. Many of these bills remained unpaid for a period as long as five months through lack of proper facilities to handle the work. This condition has been changed, and to-day advertising for this account is being placed and checked through the advertising agency. The bills are paid within the time discount is allowed, and the Government is receiving the discount, which is an item to be reckoned with, as it is of sufficient amount on all the accounts to pay three-fourths of the salaries of the staff of the advertising department.

As I understand, in the event that they did not collect their 15 per cent from the magazines which had the advertising, then the Shipping Board is responsible, but out of the $125,000 that was placed and out of the $18,000 commission received the Shipping Board actually paid but $200.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the Shipping Board, under the management of Mr. Lasker and this advertising section of the board, had placed this advertising itself, would it not have saved the commissions of $18,000 during the three months referred to?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Possibly that might have been true; but as I understand it——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. These advertisements have not been placed differently from other advertising. As I understand it, the great manufacturers of automobiles hire those agencies to place their advertisements, because this advertising business has been reduced to an exact science by getting the best possible service of agents who know how to place the advertising. The Shipping Board has done that thing, and it occurs to me that they have exercised wisdom in so placing it. They have so placed it that the contracts have actually cost the Government in the three months that the advertising has been going on but $200 out of a total commission of $18,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman states that $125,500 was expended by the Gundlach Advertising Agency from October 1 to December 31. Does the gentleman know that that advertising was done from October 1 to and including December 31, or a portion of those three months?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have the statement of Mr. Lasker that it was for the three months commencing October 1 and ending December 31.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman know that a period of time was required by the Gundlach Advertising Co. prior to October 1 to get its copy work and its art work in condition and set up, so that they could begin to advertise on October 1?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I think that is correct. But this represents the actual advertising for three months. That is, in the preliminary work that the Gundlach Advertising Co. did, of course, it was taking their own responsibility for.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The contract with the Gundlach Advertising Agency also provides for a commission of 15 per cent on its handling and mechanical reproduction, which includes ad setting, the making of half tones, electrotyping, and similar items. Does the gentleman know what the Gundlach Advertising Agency has received for that particular work?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Only the information that I have from Mr. Lasker. I have called upon Mr. Lasker for it, and he has furnished it, and it is to the effect that, all told, the Government has been out only $200 on this advertising.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is by way of commissions for that advertising, and does not refer to this extra percentage that was received for the work to which I have referred.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But in no event does the Government pay any portion of that until there is a failure on the part of the newspapers and periodicals having these advertisements and carrying them to pay it.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But the contract expressly says differently, and expressly makes provision for this extra provision of percentage.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I want to put in the RECORD this entire statement and the contract itself, and the items month by month that have been actually paid. If gentlemen have time and will scrutinize it, it occurs to me that the Government of the United States should be thankful that it has a man like Mr. Lasker who knows this advertising business. I myself do not know anything about it, and I suspect that there are but few of us here who know much about it. At its head he has been prudential in his placing of men, and it has resulted in costing the Government as little as it has cost.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. The point I make is that Mr. Lasker, being at the head of a large industry, and having in his bureau a well-equipped department of advertising, why should not that set of men make direct connection with the people who do the advertising, and thus save this 15 per cent?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will tell you why. He has not the instrumentalities at his command. If all that advertising were to be in this immediate locality, it could be done, but it is being placed all around the earth.

Mr. SNYDER. If that is so, it certainly does not require all these men, who are drawing $30,000 in salary, to make one contract with one concern.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The total cost of the clerical force all told is $24,000. That is according to the report of the department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the pending amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina: Page 28, after line 12, insert a new paragraph as follows: "Of the sums appropriated in this act not more than $500,000 shall be used for advertising purposes."

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. That motion is not in order.

Mr. SEARS. Then I rise in opposition to the motion to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Chairman, my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNYDER], wanted to know what this money was expended for. I have tried to tell the Members of the House that a large part of it was spent for the purpose of advertising to the public that there was nothing to be seen in America, and that Americans should go abroad.

I would also like to call the attention of the gentleman from New York in answer to his question to the gentleman who just preceded me, to page 1139 of the hearings, where Mr. Powell states, "Ask Mr. Lasker." And so I suggest to him, instead of asking Members of Congress, that he ask Mr. Lasker. I would also like to call the gentleman's attention to page 935 of the record, in which Mr. Lasker says:

I feel that I would like to put in the record myself anything that relates to advertising, because that is the one thing I know.

And yet he is at the head of the Shipping Board. Now, Mr. Chairman, my good friend from Indiana, the chairman of this committee [Mr. WOOD], has said that the Shipping Board was like a dog, that when you once began to kick him around everybody wants to kick him.

If my recollection serves me correctly, I do not recall any time within the past three or four years where Members on the Republican side were very anxious to defend the Shipping Board, nor do I think they are anxious to defend it to-day. I would also like to call their attention to the fact that many of the present high-salaried officials of said board were then working for the board at a smaller salary.

I call attention to page 932 of the hearings, in which Mr. Lasker states that he raised the salary of Mr. Keene from $6,000 to $9,500 and then to $10,000, and he says:

We raised him to $10,000, because we did not want to humiliate him.

Spending the money of the taxpayers, people who are groaning under the tax burden, merchants in your own town, in your own district, who are now wondering how they will be able to pay the next income tax; and yet we find the head of the great Shipping Board raising the salary of a man from $6,000 to $9,500 and then to $10,000, according to his own statement, on page 932, because he did not want to humiliate the man.

Then, Mr. Chairman, we have in this record a statement relative to Mr. Keene and why he was raised to $10,000. In order to save time, I will ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to insert the statement in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The statement referred to is as follows:

APPOINTMENT AND PROMOTION RECORD OF W. B. KEENE, TRAFFIC MANAGER.

Appointed February 18, 1918, at $4,800 per annum, Division of Operations, in charge of tug and barge traffic.

Transferred to New York February 1, 1919, as manager tug and barge department, with increase in salary to $6,000 per annum.

Effective August 6, 1919, salary was increased from $6,000 to $6,500 per annum.

Transferred and appointed assistant director of operations for the Gulf district February 1, 1920, with compensation at the rate of $9,000 per annum. (Effective Mar. 23, 1920, title of position made "district director.")

Transferred and appointed assistant director of operations, general office, Washington, August 1, 1920, with compensation at the rate of $9,500 per annum.

May 16, 1921, appointed acting director of operations, vice director, resigned.

Designated manager traffic department, Washington, on August 1, 1921, with increase in compensation from $9,500 to $10,000 per annum.

Mr. SEARS. We have before us the case of Mr. Claussen, advertising manager, who states that his salary is $750 a month. Of course no Member of Congress should complain of the testimony of Mr. Claussen. I have no fight with these gentlemen. I am simply stating the facts as brought out before the committee in the hearings. But what Member of Congress in his humble capacity, trying to serve the people and striving to return to normalcy and to reduce taxes, should complain of the statement of a man who is receiving $750 a month for some advertising propaganda when you are receiving only $625 a month. Certainly this distinguished gentleman is more able than any of my colleagues or he would not receive $750 a month. So you can go on through these hearings. The man whom Mr. Claussen succeeded received only $4,000 a year, while Mr. Claussen is now receiving $9,000 a year. And yet Mr. Lasker says, page 934 in the hearings:

Yes; but, frankly, I was limited to six men over $11,000, and there were other positions that were much more necessary than advertising, so I came within the limitation. Mr. Claussen is a very good man—and he is right here—but if this were a private business I would have gotten a much more widely experienced man, although to do that I would have had to pay more money.

On page 935 this party says:

For passenger advertising there is a tentative plan to spend at the rate of $900,000 a year.

Just think of it! Nearly a million dollars on a losing concern for passenger advertising alone, and yet we can not get a public building for any city because of our preached but not practiced program of economy.

I also find, on page 933 of the hearings, in part the following:

We advertise in the daily papers and advertise in the monthlies.

I note, however, later on, on the same page he says in part:

But the papers we are advertising in to-day are very small in number as compared with the papers used in the fiscal year expiring June 30, 1921.

I can but wonder what papers he is advertising in, nor can I help but wonder why he has made such a large cut in newspaper advertisements. Can it be it does not pay to advertise in the papers, and such being the case he feels it his duty to notify the world.

But, Mr. Chairman, I doubt very seriously if we should complain if what Mr. Lasker says on page 936 is correct. I quote:

Our bookings for March, April, and May are extremely heavy. It looks as if all the people of the United States wanted to travel on the vessels of the United States lines from the number of inquiries we receive and the reservations resulting therefrom.

Unless it be upon the one reason that we do not desire to depopulate the United States and that some Members of Congress desire to keep at least enough citizens at home to fill these high salaried offices.

Now take the case of another employee in the advertising section of the Shipping Board. In answer to a question of the chairman of this committee, "What was the excuse for giving you an additional $2,200?" he modestly replied:

It was a recognition of the responsibility I was carrying and to put me on a somewhat similar plane with men in the organization who were carrying somewhat similar responsibilities.

Normal? Mr. Chairman, I fear unless we make some radical changes the people will come to the inevitable conclusion we are abnormal.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I have listened attentively to this attempt to limit the advertising of the Shipping Board out of the appropriations that we authorize. I want to call the attention of my colleagues to the immense amount of business and the responsibility that devolves upon the activities of that establishment of this Government. From the time that we first voted to establish it down to the present time not one of us on either side of this Chamber has been able to know what has been going on in those activities, except that gold has been flowing from the Treasury faster than the water flows in any river in the world. Last July a new man was appointed head of the Shipping Board. He came from the Middle West. He has made his reputation out there. He has made a competency in his business. He is a successful manager. It was only at the urgent importunity of friends of the administration that he consented to come here and take up these duties at a nominal salary. He has surrounded himself with able men, as able as he can get in the country, he says. What has he done in six months? He has shown to you and to me what can happen in the activities of the Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation organized under that board by looking into the future, taking care of the trade routes of the world, fostering them, and increasing the passenger service and untying our passenger ships from their moorings and having them sail the ocean, carrying passengers from our ports to foreign ports and from foreign ports back; and in order to do this he says that it is necessary to compete with those engaged in competition with the American Government in the carrying business for 1923. Does anyone doubt that A. D. Lasker knows when it is wise to advertise, or whether it pays to advertise? With all our millions tied up in ships, with ships lying at the docks and taken care of by employees, costing us large sums of money every month, he says we ought to advertise and get trade with these ships and get some income, and he tells you how he wants to do it, and he wants to do it by spending a little out of the $50,000,000 herein appropriated. My colleagues, is there anything unbusinesslike in his proposition to spend almost as much money in advertising for passengers for our shipping trade as competing lines expend? More than that, $265,000 of the amount that he allocates for 1923 is to advertise the wooden ships, which are surplus stock, for the salvaging of them and other material that the American people want to get sold, in order to get those things closed up and know exactly where we stand.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WASON. Yes.

Mr. FROTHINGHAM. I should like to ask him if the Shipping Board are running more ships than these private companies that have been mentioned?

Mr. WASON. I understand that they are running a large number of ships. I know that they have trade routes. I know they are competing and are under severe competition with foreign-owned vessels, and the testimony shows that last month alone, in response to the Shipping Board's advertisements that have been criticized here, this department had to answer 12,000 inquiries, if we believe their statement, and I ask you to believe them. This is the first witness in four years who has told us the whole truth about the Shipping Board activities and its liabilities.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES].

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina) there were—ayes 33, noes 35.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 49.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: Page 28, at the end of line 12, strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the sums hereinbefore appropriated shall be used to pay a greater sum than 5 per cent as commissions for the placing of advertising matter contracted for."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. WOOD of Indiana] if he has any objection to that amendment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I take it for granted that the gentlemen who have made these contracts for 15 per cent commission have at least tried to be fair to the Government in placing this advertising.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I had hoped that the gentleman from Indiana, in view of the statement he made when last on the floor, would be willing to accept this amendment, in view of the contention that the funds of the Shipping Board have been used to pay 15 per cent commission for placing advertising matter. It is shown by the hearings that the Shipping Board for the next fiscal year propose to spend $1,700,000 for advertising purposes. If they continue the contract under which a 15 per cent commission is charged for the placing of this advertising matter, it will cost the Government of the United States the sum of $255,000. Now, the gentleman read a statement from this advertising concern stating that they had received only a very small amount of actual compensation for the placing of these contracts, but it is admitted here that the 15 per cent commission is paid for this purpose, and I have no doubt that in the long run it will come out of the funds of the Shipping Board.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I hope the gentleman will make it very brief. I have not much time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I understand that the gentleman proposes that the Government itself shall not pay exceeding 5 per cent commission upon its contribution for advertising purposes?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The purpose of my amendment is that the Government shall not pay exceeding 5 per cent commission to anybody under any circumstances for placing this advertising matter.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If that is the purpose of it, I have no objection. What I thought the gentleman meant was that they should not make a contract with any concern that collected more than 5 per cent from some outside party.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; the purpose of my amendment is to meet the statement appearing in this evidence that the Shipping Board has paid as high as 15 per cent commission for placing this advertising matter.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have no objection to the amendment myself if that is the purpose of it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The purpose of the gentleman is to prevent the Shipping Board making a contract with the Gundlach Advertising Agency authorizing them to charge that 15 per cent, which notifies the magazines and the newspapers of the country that they can allow that for 15 per cent in fixing a rate.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Absolutely.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit, the amendment would continue to permit the Shipping Board to make a contract with an advertising agency whereby the magazines will add to their rates the 15 per cent knowing that the Gundlach Advertising Agency can get that money from the Shipping Board to pay the increased rate. In other words, knowing that they will have to pay the Gundlach Agency 15 per cent, they simply add that amount to their bills.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I desire to amend the amendment by adding the following words at the end of the amendment:

Nor shall the Shipping Board enter into any contract under which they agree to allow an advertising agency to receive more than 5 per cent for placing advertising.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina to the amendment offered by Mr. BANKHEAD: At the end of the amendment add the following language: "Nor shall the Shipping Board enter into any contract under which they agree to allow any advertising agency to receive more than 5 per cent for placing advertising."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be a very serious mistake to adopt that amendment. If it is not adopted, the Shipping Board may make a very advantageous contract in placing this advertising, whereby the cost will not inure to the Government of the United States in any event in excess of 5 per cent, and you would simply be destroying the purpose of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I want to ask the gentleman if he sincerely wants to accomplish the same purpose the gentleman from Alabama desires?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I do.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Taking that for granted, is it not a fact that this amendment will not disturb at all the contract that the Shipping Board now has with the Gundlach Advertising Agency by which they receive 15 per cent for placing advertising?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That possibly may be true upon the proposition that we can not legislate against an existing contract, but there may be other contracts, and as I understand it, although I may be mistaken about this, there are contracts made with these different agencies for the purpose of placing this advertising whereby the advertising agency seeks, first, to get their pay from the papers in which the advertising is placed. If that be true, that does not cost the Government anything, and in no event can it cost the Government more than 5 per cent if they have to pay it themselves. Therefore, why not give the Government some latitude so that they can place advantageously these advertisements no matter what it costs on the outside. If it does not cost us anything, we ought not to handicap the Shipping Board by making it impossible to do that.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in support of the amendment to the amendment. I ask for recognition simply to make this plain. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] wants to agree with me when the Shipping Board makes a contract with the Gundlach Advertising Agency whereby they authorize them, as I understand his statement, to receive 15 per cent. Is that true?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Say that the gentleman as the representative of the Gundlach Advertising Agency comes to me, and I have an advertising rate of $1 an inch or $5 an inch, and he says I must pay him 15 per cent for placing an advertisement with me. Does not the gentleman from Indiana know that I am going to add to my advertising rate such an amount as will enable me to pay that 15 per cent? I know that it can be paid, that it is authorized, that the Shipping Board will agree to pay the total amount, because they have authorized them to collect it, and that they are not going to reduce their rate 15 per cent, but are simply going to add the 15 per cent to make this amount.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama be adopted, that very arrangement the gentleman is talking about would not cost the Government anything except possibly the 5 per cent.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. As the gentleman said on the floor in response to a question by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], it will cost the Government the amount of the commission which the advertising agency receives from the magazines. If the board placed its own advertising it would save this 15 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the payment of claims, damage charges, and miscellaneous adjustments, $50,000,000, of which $30,000,000 shall be immediately available.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 25, after the word "available," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following language: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the payment of any such claims, damage charges, or miscellaneous adjustments unless based upon legal liability on the part of the United States in the written opinion of the legal representatives of the Shipping Board."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, on the reservation of the point of order to the paragraph, I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] what authority at law there is for the payment of claims, damages, charges, and miscellaneous adjustments?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. In answer to the gentleman's inquiry, I call his attention to the shipping act, subsection "c," page 34:

(c) As soon as practicable after the passage of this act the board shall adjust, settle, and liquidate all matters arising out of or incident to the exercise by or through the President of any of the powers or duties conferred or imposed upon the President by any such act or parts of acts; and for this purpose the board, instead of the President, shall have and exercise any of such powers and duties relating to the determination and payment of just compensation: Provided, That any person dissatisfied with any decision of the board shall have the same right to suc the United States as he would have had if the decision had been made by the President of the United States under the acts hereby repealed.

Mr. WALSH. Are these the claims mentioned in the shipping act that this money is to adjust?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is what they are. It is not for the settlement of any claims that have been created by virtue of this current operation.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the gentleman think that this paragraph ought to be amended so that that would be clear? Under this language they can pay any claim whether it is authorized under the shipping act or not.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have no objection to any amendment that might be offered to make it absolutely certain, if there is any doubt in the mind of the gentleman or of the committee with reference to the purpose of the proposal.

Mr. WALSH. The testimony which the gentleman took, which resulted in this item being placed in the bill, was with reference to claims which were permissible under the terms of the shipping act?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. All of them.

Mr. WALSH. And no other claims were given consideration, either by the men who appeared on behalf of the Fleet Corporation and the Shipping Board or by the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct. They were all with reference to claims that were created under this act and under this authority, and, as I stated, there are about $140,000,000 of those claims that, in the opinion of those who have had to do with the adjustment and attempted settlement, can be settled possibly with this $50,000,000.

Mr. WATSON. How many claims have been adjusted out of the $140,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. About one-half of them have been adjusted.

Mr. WATSON. If they are adjusted, they will come out of the $30,000,000?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Out of the $50,000,000. Thirty million dollars is made immediately available.

Mr. DOWELL. Why should not Congress make this appropriation for the claims that have been adjusted, and then have the board bring in the other claims and adjust them and then allow them? Why make the appropriation in advance and leave it to the board to make the adjustment?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state in answer to the gentleman that there is a very good reason that that should not be done. We are hoping this Congress may adjourn by the 1st of June next. The Congress in all probability will not be in session when it is possible to have settled many of these claims to an advantage to the Government. If the Congress is to make this settlement, they will insist upon having a larger amount. It is a discretion that should be lodged in the Shipping Board.

And if their statement to us is correct it is going to result in a very great saving, and, as I stated the other day, and I repeat it now, a great number of these manufacturing concerns throughout the country to whom these claims are due are in a very precarious condition, and a few dollars now means more than twice as many dollars in the future.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman have any objection to inserting after the word "adjustments" the words "authorized under the provisions of the merchant marine act of 1920"?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have not.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw my reservation of the point of order to the paragraph, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 28, line 25, after the word "available," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following language: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the payment of any such claim, damage, charges, or miscellaneous adjustments unless based on legal liability on the part of the United States on the written opinion of the legal representatives of the Shipping Board."

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I assume that neither the chairman of the subcommittee nor any other member of the Committee on Appropriations has any objection to the principle embodied in the amendment I propose.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But it occurs to me it is a useless amendment for the reason that if these gentlemen are paid any of these claims without it having been done within the meaning of the amendment proposed the officials would be guilty of violating the law.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I thought the gentleman from Indiana would give that as an excuse for not accepting this amendment. It is the only excuse that could be offered, viewing these matters as the gentleman does. However, if I am given time I believe I can explain to the satisfaction of the Members of this House that this amendment is absolutely necessary in order to do the very thing it proposes to do. Now, in the first place this bill proposes an appropriation of $50,000,000, not to pay debts against the Shipping Board, which has been provided for in other appropriations, but it is for the payment of unliquidated claims against the Government to the aggregate amount of about $100,000,000. While it is true, as contended and as stated in the testimony of Mr. Lasker, that there are claims amounting to $298,000,000, from which are to be deducted offsets of $79,000,000, leaving a balance of $219,000,000, yet, as Mr. Lasker himself testified, nearly $55,000,000 of this amount are already in the admiralty courts, and $62,000,000 have been brought in the Court of Claims, and after deducting those amounts and the admitted offsets Mr. Lasker himself states that there are left only $100,000,000 for settlement by the Shipping Board. To quote Mr. Lasker:

Deducting, therefore, items in litigation, takes out $116,000,000 and leaves approximately $100,000,000 of claims for adjudication by the Shipping Board. We do not propose to ask any appropriation for the admiralty claims and for the claims in the Court of Claims, because they can only be asked for as the courts give their final decisions. That leaves us with approximately $100,000,000 of contractors' claims, claims for the requisitioning of vessels and miscellaneous claims to settle.

Now, with regard to these claims, I want to say this, that the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has had occasion from time to time to give considerable investigation to these matters in connection with pending bills. Those claimants who have gone into the Court of Claims have gone there because they believed they had valid rights which they could successfully assert in a court. Those who have gone into the admiralty court have gone there for the same reason, and those who have remained on the outside, and who, as was admitted before the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, at least in large part did not go into those courts because their claims were not based upon legal or contractual liability, so they have remained out of those courts. They are not going into those courts because their claims rest on no legal liability, and their only recourse is that their claims will be paid under a lump-sum appropriation, which claims they know could not stand in any court in the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. This is a very important matter, and I ask unanimous consent to continue for 10 minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Make it five minutes, and I will answer in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. For a brief question.

Mr. DOWELL. Under this amendment, however, whether the claim is legal or not, if they have the written opinion of the attorney it makes it legal under this——

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman——

Mr. DOWELL. Then why not accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts and file these claims and come within the law instead of placing it in the hands of an attorney of the board. It seems to me that that throws the door wide open.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I am frank to say to the gentleman that I think that my proposed amendment is very mild and reasonable, and I would have liked to have gone further. I undertook to prepare an amendment which, if not accepted by the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee, I hope will be accepted by the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DOWELL. If the gentleman will just yield for a moment, I wish to say that his amendment is so mild it is of no value. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has suggested an amendment which is of value.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will listen to my remarks, I think I can show him the meaning and the importance of my amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee in no way interferes with the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts or does it detract from it.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. No; it does not. Now, in regard to these claims that this proposed appropriation is to cover, I want you to see what Chairman Lasker himself says about it. Speaking of these claims, he says:

> It is well known that a man or concern in making a claim against the Government adds in everything anybody else owes him and everything he owes anybody else. When that is all added up, he adds in the date for good measure; then when he gets through with that he multiplies it by six, or whatever number occurs to him, and then you have his claim.

And yet, in spite of that opinion of Chairman Lasker himself of the character of these claims, we are asked to make an appropriation that will authorize him to pay 50 cents on the dollar to claimants that refuse to go into the Court of Claims or the admiralty court for adjudication of their claims. Now, how does he propose to do it? He testifies as to the method, and here we are getting down to the meat of my amendment. Mr. Lasker says:

> Here is the way in which we are proceeding to adjust claims: Before the present Shipping Board came into being we had a department in the legal department of the Shipping Board which settled claims. When the new Shipping Board came in we found awaiting us what are the dregs of the claims, and therefore we wanted to have them more thoroughly checked than could be the case if done just by our own employees. So we established what we call the United States Shipping Board Claims Commission. We got very high-grade men on it, the members of the commission being Judge Walter D. Meals, formerly justice of the appellate court of Ohio, who is the chairman of the commission; Mr. Arthur W. Peele, of Patterson, Peele & Dennis, and vice president of the American Institute of Accountants; Mr. Homer L. Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co.; Capt. R. M. Watt, formerly chief constructor of the Navy; and Mr. F. W. Wood, of Baltimore, formerly president of the Maryland Steel Co. Thus, as you will see, we have the law represented, we have the practical shipbuilders represented, and we have the Government represented in shipbuilding through the Navy. Then we have the accountants of the country represented through their vice president.

Attention is called to the personnel of this commission, only one of whom is a lawyer, two of whom are taken from and are representatives of the ship-construction interests, one of whom is an accountant, and one of whom is a former officer in the Navy. That is the board that is given this jurisdiction, instead of the legal department. Now, why? Mr. Lasker proceeds as follows:

> Experience has now proved that this system can be improved, because whereas all claims up to now have been looked upon as purely legal questions, we have gained some experience and find that they also involve matters of fact that can be arrived at very readily by people who understand the shipbuilding industry. We are, therefore, instituting certain changes in the original system. It was a hard matter to get good shipbuilding men two or three years ago, because the shipyards were pretty full then, but now you can get all the shipbuilders you want.

You notice that he refers to the system that was in vogue. The system that was formerly in vogue was simply nothing more than the ruling of the former chairman of the Shipping Board, John Barton Payne, that these claims should not be allowed unless they were predicated upon contractual or legal liability on the part of the Government. And he stated—and it is a fact that can not be disputed, it was a fact that was admitted by the representatives of the ship-contracting interests that appeared before our committee—that the Shipping Board was proposing to and was settling with those claimants where they could agree upon the amount when their claims were predicated upon legal liability. But the trouble was, as was admitted, that they were asking damages from the Government that were not justified by any existing law or contract.

If I had the time, I would read from the hearings in which was stated the exact controversy, and that there was no trouble between them as to liability upon contracts or damages for the cancellation of contracts, but the complaint was where the ship contractors came in and asked that the Government reimburse them for the whole cost of their yards—to come in and make them whole. Although not predicated upon any contractual liability, they wanted the Government to pay them. In order to meet that situation the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries reported out a bill that was called a bill for the relief of wooden-ship contractors, and it proposed to pay and liquidate these claims that were not authorized to be settled by existing law, and so-forth. However, that bill was defeated in the House after full discussion, the House then refusing to authorize the payment of claims not predicated upon contract or legal liability. With regard to the questions involved in that bill and in at least a large part of these claims, there can not be any question. For instance, when Mr. Fahey, representative of these shipping contractors, was before our committee and discussed the position taken by Judge Payne with regard to these matters, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], the ranking majority member on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and who is well versed in these matters, made this statement:

> Mr. EDMONDS. I think Judge Payne is absolutely right, but then, of course, he is willing, I presume, if he gets the authority, to go as far as Congress will go with him.
> Mr. FAHEY. Certainly.
> Mr. EDMONDS. I think he is absolutely right in the stand he has taken, because I would not be in his position and take the responsibility of spending $49,000,000 or $50,000,000 of the taxpayers' money without authority. He would certainly be under severe criticism about it if he did.

However, that bill was reported out, and it came up for discussion on the floor of the House, and it was contended by the proponents of the bill, including Mr. EDMONDS, that these claims could not be paid according to contract or any existing law that was intended to meet that situation, and it was intended to make them whole, just as it was expressed, for instance, by Mr. EDMONDS, who took an active part in favor of the bill. He said:

> Mr. Payne doubted his authority to settle these contracts—not the portion of the contract that was legal, which Judge Davis called attention to, but the question of the claim that was made by these men for an entire return of the capital invested.
> The only thing in controversy is, Are you going to pay the original investment made by these men in shipyards?
> The bill is drawn around this fact—that it is desired to return the original investment to these men; in other words, pay for their plants.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], the ranking minority member on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, who likewise supported that bill for the relief of wooden-ship contractors, expressed it as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, I hope it will be understood by all the Members of the House that Mr. Payne based his action in refusing to adjust and settle these claims solely upon the legal proposition that as an administrative officer and as a good lawyer he did not believe that the Shipping Board has the right to make any settlements covering anything else except the legal obligations of the Government of the United States; that they had no right to consider the moral and implied obligations, or particularly the moral obligation.

During the consideration of said bill I offered an amendment to insert, after the word "claims," the words "based upon contracts, expressed or implied." In discussing my amendment the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] declared:

> Mr. Chairman, should the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] pass, it would simply defeat the purposes of the bill.

And the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] stated:

> Mr. Chairman, as just stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], the amendment now offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is simply destructive of the whole bill. Already and without any legislation any shipbuilder has a perfect right to recover for contract prices whether the contract be expressed or implied.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate what the gentleman is intending to do by his amendment, but I fear instead of closing the door he opens it wide. The reading of this amendment would indicate it provides for the payment of any of these claims upon the written opinion of the attorney for the Shipping Board. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] closes the door, and only permits claims to be paid as permitted under the Shipping Board act passed some time ago. My fear of the gentleman's amendment is this: Should the attorney for the Shipping Board render a written opinion regarding a doubtful claim, holding it to be legal and payable, would not this amendment, by reason of the opinion of the attorney, make the claim a legal one, irrespective of its otherwise legality? Illegal claims should not be paid. And Congress should not enact a law basing the legality of a claim upon the opinion of the attorney of the department passing upon it. I think the gentleman's intention is all right, but his amendment, instead of closing the door, might open it wide and permit any claim to be paid that the attorney may recommend.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. Assuming the House should not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts should be adopted, who do you think will pass on the legality of the claims?

Mr. DOWELL. I have no doubt that the attorney for the Shipping Board will pass upon the claim, but we should only allow a claim that is legal under the statute, and we should not legalize it because he passes upon it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. If this amendment is adopted, how do we in any way disparage the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. DOWELL. We legalize the attorney's opinion. That is what we object to. I want to compel the board to comply strictly with the law, and I have no doubt the attorneys will so advise, but I am not willing in advance to legalize a claim on the written opinion of the attorney.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Is not that attorney for the Shipping Board the one who will have full and exact knowledge of the thing? Is he not the only one to pass upon it?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly; but he must pass upon it under the act passed some time ago.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. The point is this, that if a member of the legal staff should declare a claim to be legal, his opinion would be final, and the gentleman objects to legalizing it in that way?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes. I do not wish an act of the Shipping Board to be considered as determining the legality of the claim in that way.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. My amendment provides that it shall not be paid unless that is done. The commission is composed of five members, only one of whom is a lawyer, and my idea is that a representative of the legal department of the Shipping Board should pass upon it, and give an opinion to the effect that the Government is liable before it is paid. It may not be paid then, but certainly it should not be paid until then.

Mr. DOWELL. I object to legalizing it in advance before he renders an opinion.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I call the attention of the committee to a very dangerous proposal in this amendment, which reads as follows:

> That none of these claims shall be paid unless based upon legal liability on the part of the United States.

Now, I take it for granted that the lawyers here, at least, will understand that that might result in the prevention of the settlement of a single one of these claims. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], who introduced the amendment, after examining the facts and the law in regard to a certain claim, might or might not conclude that there was a legal liability. Myself, as a lawyer, on the other hand, with the same facts before me, might conclude that the gentleman from Tennessee was wrong. There is not a case of importance that is decided by the Supreme Court of the United States to-day but what there is a divided opinion with reference to the legal liability.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. Who do you think would assume the responsibility of paying a claim if the statute itself would provide that the claim must be based upon actual legal liability?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Certainly it would not settle the claim. It would destroy the very purpose of it. If this appropriation is going to be worth anything, it is for the purpose of compromising and settling these claims. As Mr. Lasker says, the fact that there are among these claims millions of dollars that are absolutely just is one of the reflections upon this Government when no provision has been made to pay them short of the Claims Court.

There are lots of questions arising with respect to these claims in which honest men would honestly differ about this thing. Suppose the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] comes here as a claimant, and he feels in his heart that he is entitled to $50,000 in payment of that claim. Suppose the representative of the Shipping Board, on the other hand, is of opinion that he is entitled to only $35,000. The gentleman from Texas, we will suppose, is represented by a good lawyer, honest, and is convinced that he is right in his contention, and the legal member of the Shipping Board is equally honest and convinced in his opinion that he is entitled to only $35,000. In order that a settlement may be had, they will agree upon splitting the difference. Now, according to the contention of the gentleman from Texas, who is going to say that the representative of the Shipping Board or the gentleman representing the gentleman from Texas is right?

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the gentleman be willing to authorize out of the Treasury of the United States money to be paid to a claimant where the legal authority employed by the Shipping Board said it was an illegal claim?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I would not; no.

Mr. OLIVER. If a condition such as the gentleman suggests should arise, of course if the claim can not be settled on a legal basis that party should be sent to the Court of Claims.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. There is another consideration that enters into this matter. The Government was appealing to these men to furnish their material during the war. There are equities in these cases perhaps that ought to enter into the matter in many instances, and I suppose there are hundreds of cases where the equity side of the proposition ought to be determined. Now, if this amendment is adopted there can not be any equity in the case; none.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. On these claims where there is a dispute, for instance, where a claim is for $1,000,000 and the commission finds there is only $700,000, does not the gentleman think it a wise provision to send the whole thing to the Court of Claims, or at least the disputed part, rather than allow these people to compromise?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That might occur.

Mr. BEGG. It occurs in many instances.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and it will occur in these cases the way they are determining that thing now, and it strikes me it is the fairest thing in the world. I come before the Shipping Board with a claim. The gentleman representing the legal department of the Shipping Board turns it down. Now, the officer of the Shipping Board says to me as a claimant, "If you are willing you can submit this thing to the claims division, composed of the five men stated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS], where they sit in banc and try that case and make their recommendation, subject, however, to the final approval of the Shipping Board." If, after that thing is done, this claims commission finds out that I am entitled to something and the officer of the Shipping Board gives it his approval, that is the character of cases they are settling, and they will settle about $140,000,000 for $50,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. In the outset, after I offered this amendment, I understood the position of the gentleman from Indiana to be that he saw no objection to the principle embodied in the amendment, but declined to accept it because it was useless, because no Government official could pay any claim if it was not based upon legal liability. I understand the gentleman's present position to be different from that, and he now takes the position that, on account of equities, and so forth, involved, this restriction should not be imposed.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. When the gentleman from Tennessee first read his amendment, without examining it I felt that it was a useless amendment, because the very thing he was suggesting in it would be the guidance of the men having it up for settlement. But on reading it again I find that he has made it absolutely impossible for any man to take and settle these claims, for the reason that the gentleman from Tennessee might say that there was a legal liability and I might say that there was no legal liability, and there might be a dozen lawyers passing upon it, with a dozen different opinions about it. We all know that in the main, unless a man would stultify himself or be dishonest to the Government, some equitable or legal liability might appear, and there should be discretion lodged somewhere whereby honest men can settle honest differences. That is all that this would need.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] should be adopted. In this connection I wish to read a statement made to Congress by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] last August, which suggests the danger of appropriations of this character. The House then refused to make any appropriations to the Shipping Board for the settlement of claims, although the Shipping Board, through Mr. Lasker, its chairman, strongly urged that at least $24,000,000 be appropriated for the settlement of claims. The RECORD discloses that the House was unanimous in its approval of the position taken by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], yet we now find the House confronted with a request from the Shipping Board for $50,000,000 for the purpose of settling claims. On page 4924 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the following statement by Mr. MADDEN appears:

> They asked for $24,000,000 to pay claims. We did not think they ought to have the right to pay any claims, and so we cut that out. [Applause.] We did not think that any board ought to be charged with the responsibility or given the authority to adjust indefinite claims without limit. And as far as I am concerned, my attitude is this: I do not think any board ought to come and ask for money to adjust claims that have not been adjusted and certified. [Applause.] I do not think any claims after they are adjusted ought to be paid until after we have examined them, and I do not know whether they ought to be paid then until they have been litigated and go to final judgment. I think if you litigate these claims and let them go to final judgment, in most cases you will stop graft. However, we refused to allow any appropriation for the payment of claims.

Such was the attitude of the House in August, 1921, and no sound reason has been advanced for reversing that position. If the House should conclude to appropriate $50,000,000 for the settlement of claims, certainly there can be no sound objections to the adoption of the pending amendment, which seeks to require that a written opinion from the attorney of the Shipping Board must be obtained as to the legality of the claim before it is settled out of any part of the $50,000,000 herein sought to be appropriated. The very fact that the Adjustment Board, which will have in charge this $50,000,000, is probably organized without authority of law—only one member of the board being a lawyer—suggests the importance of requiring that before any claim is settled by this board it must be carefully considered by the attorney of the Shipping Board and the legal opinion obtained from him that it is a legal claim against the Government.

If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] wishes to refer the claim to the Attorney General for his approval, then he can offer an amendment to that effect, but certainly the opinion of some responsible legal department of the Government should be obtained as to the legality of the claim before payment is made. It is not the purpose of the House in providing this fund to authorize the payment of mere equitable claims or those which can not be enforced in the Court of Claims. A statement by the chairman of the Shipping Board, Mr. Lasker, shows that there are outstanding only about $100,000,000 of claims which it is proposed to settle with this appropriation. He states that no part of the appropriation is asked for or will be used in the payment of the claims now pending in admiralty courts or in the Court of Claims, and we are asked here to appropriate $50,000,000 for the settlement of $100,000,000 of claims, and certainly the House, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], which I have just read, will insist that a legal opinion from the Shipping Board attorney be made a condition precedent to the payment of any claim.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If I understand the last position of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], it is to the effect that the Shipping Board has so many lawyers that they would disagree among themselves and would never come to any conclusion if you allowed only legal liabilities. As a matter of fact, I think the amendment should be adopted, since if it is not adopted the board may allow any claim they want to, whether there is a legal liability or not. If we adopt the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, they will have to be such claims as are authorized by the merchant marine law, and in addition thereto then there must be an opinion by the legal department of the Shipping Board that there is a legal liability. Of course, these claims will be passed on in a practical way, as everyone knows, by the lawyer who has the matter in charge looking the thing over and determining whether it is a legal liability, and then his opinion will be subject to review by Mr. Schlesinger, who is the chief counsel of the board, or some one authorized by him.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] takes the position that it would make it legal when the attorney for the Shipping Board passed on it. That is an absurd statement, because it says that even after it is authorized by what is stated in this law, and even after it is authorized by the amendment that has been suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, then in addition to that it shall be disallowed unless the attorney or the legal department of the Shipping Board says that it is a legal liability. There is before us the question of adopting a policy. If we pay moral obligations of the Shipping Board when there is no legal basis, the floodgates are opened. All kinds of claims arose out of the war. There are sugar claims and other claims before the Committee on Agriculture which even the attorneys for the claimant admit are not legal liabilities. The attorneys for the company admit that there is no legal liability, and yet the Attorney General says the claims should be paid, and that is the whole issue. There will be a number of such claims presented. If you are going to allow moral claims, there is no telling how many will be presented in every department of the Government.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Did not the Attorney General before the committee say there was not only moral but legal liability?

Mr. JONES of Texas. He said at first that he thought there was a legal liability, but that was before he knew the attorneys for the sugar company admitted that there was no legal liability, and he later qualified his opinion. If you are going to pay moral claims, there are all kinds of claims that will arise. The Government fixed prices on various things. It fixed the price of wheat. When wheat was $2.75 a bushel the Government fixed the price at $2.20 a bushel, and a great many farmers think they have a moral claim, and a lot of grain dealers think they have a moral claim against the Government on that account, and their claims are on a much higher basis than many of these. If any claim is to be allowed where there is no legal liability, thousands of claims will arise everywhere. If we pass the appropriation as it is worded here, I am sure that a great portion of this appropriation will be paid out on claims in which, even in the opinion of the attorney who passes on them, there is no legal liability.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think the Government ought to pay claims which would be legal as between individuals?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, yes; but under this appropriation the board may pay claims that would not be legal liabilities as between individuals. There may be claims of various characters, some of which I have cited, where there is no legal liability and no contractual liability, and a man could not go into court and maintain the claim at all, and yet full authority is given here to settle them. These men, part of whom are interested in the ship business, would be allowed to permit such a claim to go through, and this appropriation would pay for it, even though all these 80 lawyers might render a combined opinion in which they all agreed that there was no legal liability. The board could say, "We will pay it anyway." Talking about practical matters, no concern pays a claim of any importance unless its attorney will state over his own signature that there is a liability. As a business proposition they would not permit claims to be paid until some lawyer had passed on them. They may have employed a firm of 40 lawyers, as was suggested here, but they would wait until the firm signed its firm name to the opinion that certain things should be done before they would consider that the matter had been ultimately and finally disposed of. If you do not adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, you will throw the door wide open to all claims whether legal or not.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 23, 24, and 25.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order at this time. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question being taken; on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 14, noes 30.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. WALSH offers the following amendment: Page 28, line 24, after the word "adjustment," insert the words "authorized under the provisions of the merchant marine act of 1920."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] to strike out lines 23 to 25, inclusive. The proposition contained in those lines is most extraordinary. It is to turn over $50,000,000 for the adjustment of claims against the United States Government in private. That is exactly what it amounts to. Now, during the last year a great many gentlemen have been talking about getting back to prewar "normalcy." But did any person ever hear of a war measure that had less of "normalcy" about it than has this proposition to turn over without any restrictions $50,000,000 for what will, to all intents and purposes, be the private payment of claims? That is the proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman know of any other branch of the Government in which we take this method to settle claims?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; I do not.

Mr. WALSH. We require them to come to Congress with a special act, do we not?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There is no other business in any other branch of the Government that is like this.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We compel other claimants to go to the Court of Claims and establish their claims, and when judgments of that court are against the Government no money to pay them goes out of the United States Treasury until Congress knows what the findings are and passes a law authorizing payment. But here is $50,000,000 handed to a board, two of whom, I understand from what was said a moment ago, were members of shipbuilding firms, to do with practically as it pleases.

And some of these claims are for the building of ships. A lawyer will come with a claimant to this board having $50,000,000 at its disposal, and talk to its members. They can, after negotiations in private, make a decision in private, and they have unlimited power so to make it. Now, I am not saying that members of the board are dishonest, but the Federal Constitution and the various State constitutions make it plain that our forefathers believed that no person in an executive place ought, in time of peace, to be given absolute discretion in the disposition of public funds. Payment of claims against the Government ought to be made only after a public hearing, with an opportunity for the examination and cross-examination of witnesses not in private but in public. Analyze these four lines, forget all the talk that we have heard here about the possible settlements and adjustments to be made if this vast sum of money is thus turned over, and what is the proposition? Stated in a few words, it is to hand out $50,000,000 that the taxpayers in your district and in mine raised by hard work, and permit it to be used in the private settlement of claims, and the money to be paid out before you, the representative of your taxpaying constituents, know anything about the payments.

Mr. Chairman, such a proposition can not be defended in a time of peace. Perhaps when the war was on there may have been justification for presenting unlimited sums of money to men to be disbursed in their discretion. But now, three years after the war is ended, thus to turn fifty millions over to any body of men, and, of all persons, to a body having the record of the Shipping Board, is absolutely unpardonable. It is, as I said, turning over $50,000,000 of the public funds to be used for the adjustment of claims in private, and to be paid out before Congress can know anything about it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER or Wisconsin. In time of peace this proposal can not be defended.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes, sir.

Mr. OLIVER. Is the gentleman aware that there is no legal authority for the organization of this adjustment board that will have the right to expend the $50,000,000?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I infer it from the intimation which the gentleman's question carries. Moreover, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], who is very familiar with this subject, assured me a moment ago, in reply to my question, that there is no law regulating the procedure to be followed by this board in handling the $50,000,000. Any or all of its members can consult with the chairman or his lawyer anywhere at any time. They can hear witnesses anywhere in private, or they need not hear witnesses. We simply give them unlimited discretion to hand out the taxpayers' money in payment of private claims.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The gentleman from Massachusetts is absolutely correct. This provision in the merchant marine act to which reference is made is simply a broad, general authorization to settle and adjust claims. It provides no method for procedure; it does not even provide that the claims shall be legal or based on contractual liability or anything.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the more I think of this the more I am reminded that Thomas Jefferson said that "the Republic of the United States is, in large part, founded upon distrust of men in places of executive power."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. WALSH.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out lines 23, 24, and 25 on page 28.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 28, strike out lines 23, 24, 25.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, there are but two safe ways to adjust claims against the Government. The safest way is through the legal machinery organized by the Government, namely, the Court of Claims. To me that is the only way that seems at all within the bounds of reason for settling a claim of any size. A small claim of a few hundred dollars may be adjusted safely and satisfactorily by a department chief, but claims mounting into the millions it seems to me should go through the Court of Claims.

Many of these claims are disputed. I happen to know about several of them pending before the Shipping Board, and there is a dispute amounting to $5,000,000 in one particular claim.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Does not the gentleman think by having some one settle it in this way that the representatives of the Shipping Board would get a better settlement of these claims?

Mr. BEGG. In reply to that I would say no. If that is true, then what is the use of having the Court of Claims? Why not appoint an adjuster and let him settle everything? We are not requiring any of these claims two or three years after the war is over to go through the Court of Claims. I concede that perhaps we should not do that in every case. Then the only other safe proposition is to let the adjustment board hear the case and take the evidence and submit the evidence to this House through the Commitee on Claims, and let us have the evidence before we are asked to vote the money out. There is not a man here who has not a reasonable amount of intelligence and fairness, nor is there a man here who would not like to know something about where the money is going before he votes out $50,000,000.

I direct attention to what happened in the War Department, and I want it distinctly understood that I am not charging dishonesty. In the War Department under the Dent Act the same thing was allowed as in this proposition, only we appropriated on a larger scale. We have paid out to 10,000 or more contractors in the United States since the war ended between two and three billion dollars. Henry Ford's company, of Detroit, Mich., got seven and three-quarter million dollars from this Government, and incidentally I smile every time I read those facts; he is the man who was going to be patriotic and take no profit out of the war. Yet he drew seven and three-quarter million dollars out of this Government as adjusted claims and never delivered a monkey wrench. He received over $5,000,000 for spare parts and never sent down a single thing to the Government. He never constructed a building for that purpose. I would like to know if the spare parts could not have been utilized in the regular business that he is in? I can not prove that he got a dollar more than he was entitled to; but I do maintain that the whole public is entitled to know all of the facts in a settlement as big as $500,000, let alone $5,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Under the Dent Act, in spite of what the gentleman has said as to the results, it authorized only settlements upon contracts expressed or implied.

Mr. BEGG. Expressed or implied. They got under cover under that word implied. We are voting $50,000,000 to-day, and there are five men who are going to decide who shall receive it. The Court of Claims with its legal machinery will have nothing whatsoever to say about the legality or the validity of the claim or the rightfulness of it, and we are voting the money into the hands of five men to dispense where they will, how they will, and when they will; and every day we are reading in the newspapers right now that Mr. Mellon, the Secretary of the Treasury, is alarmed on account of the financial condition of the Treasury, and he states that we are liable to put ourselves into bankruptcy if we vote a bonus for the soldiers. The protests that are coming into my office against the soldiers' bonus are coming, nine times out of ten, from the biggest benefactors out of the settlement of war claims in this country. We found money to pay them, and if you are going to find money to the tune of $50,000,000 to give Mr. Lasker's five men to pay for the war claims, I say to you that we have plenty of money to give to the soldier boys. [Applause.] I want you to know that I am not demagoguing in that. I shall vote with any man in this House to force every man with a claim to go through the Court of Claims; and if we have not Courts of Claims enough, then I shall vote to establish enough so that they can hear the cases properly. At the same time, the Department of Justice is busy investigating many of these settlements under war powers. Overpayments were common, charges of graft numerous, and dissatisfaction rife; yet we vote $50,000,000 more to continue that unsatisfactory state. Why the grand rush? The same arguments that are made to-day for this item were made one and two years ago, yet these firms have not gone into bankruptcy.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I understand there are about $300,000,000 of claims in suit against the Shipping Board, and those claims are being defended at a cost to the Government of $600,000 a year. In other words, it costs the Government one-fifth of 1 per cent to defend the claims actually in suit against the Shipping Board. I believe that is a very low rate of cost for legal defense. I do not believe that private suits are defended at less than 5 per cent. I believe that would be the absolute minimum, and I understand that the big, well-managed corporations do not defend their litigation on a basis better than 2½ to 3 per cent, depending upon the efficiency of the legal department and the amount of business defended.

Now the Shipping Board is defending its business on the basis of one-fifth of 1 per cent, and I think that is a pretty good argument in favor of its efficiency. It shows the Shipping Board is doing its business and defending the interests of the Government at a minimum cost. Now, in addition to the $300,000,000 of claims in suit, there are a great many million dollars of other claims which are not in suit, and the Shipping Board say they can settle those claims on a very advantageous basis, and they asked us to let them have $50,000,000, $30,000,000 of which to be immediately available for that purpose. I do not know how any private business could function if it was not permitted to settle its just obligations promptly. I do not believe anybody would do business with a private corporation that would not do so, and the Shipping Board is in no different position in that respect from any private corporation. There are just claims of people who will be ruined if those claims are not paid, and to say that they have got to go to the Court of Claims or to say that they have got to go into a court and sue on those claims is unjust and unreasonable and a bad and unprofitable business for the Government of the United States.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HUSTED. We have got to have confidence in the men who are running the business of the country, and I see no reason on the record why we should not have confidence in the men who are in charge of the Shipping Board to-day. Why, you would think, to hear gentlemen talk upon the floor of this House, that they were a lot of crooks, that they were disposed to rob the Government, and if we put this $50,000,000 in their hands they would pay unjust and dishonest claims. We have no right to take any such position. We have a right to assume this money will be expended honestly, economically, and in the interest of the Government in the payment of just and righteous claims, and I do not believe there is any man on the floor of this House who really thinks the money would be expended in any other way. I think it would be most unjust and most unfair to say to these men who have these claims against the Government, "You must go into the Court of Claims, wait a year or two until you are ruined before you get the money, or go into the courts and sue there and get judgment and then come here and ask of the Committee on Appropriations to provide the money to pay the judgment. This business of running our merchant marine is a private business. It has to be treated in the same way. It has been very expensive to the Government of the United States, but we are in it, and we have got to get out of it in the best way we can. We ought not to hamstring the men who are in charge of it, and should not place them in a position where they can not manage the business in a business-like way. That is exactly what you will do if you proceed in the present course and carry out the present attitude in legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, on page 906 of the hearings the question was asked of Mr. Lasker:

> Mr. DICKINSON. That is a lump appropriation, but you did not set up any specific claims.
>
> Mr. LASKER. We are perfectly willing, if the Appropriation Committee desires it, to send special deficiency bills each week as we settle claims. However, if we had a lump sum in hand we could settle these claims infinitely cheaper than if the claimants must come before Congress and have special bills passed for the payment of their claims.
>
> Mr. WOOD. That is what I had in mind when I spoke about making it available, and for this reason, that some of these men are in need of money, and a more advantageous settlement could be made now than could be made after a while.
>
> Mr. LASKER. Yes. No doubt there are many claims that could be settled for less than the amount asked. I am not speaking of any claim in particular, but simply in a general way; there might be a claim which otherwise we would settle for $200,000, and if we had the cash in hand and could hand it over the counter we might settle it for $120,000. It is a most wasteful system of economy that the Government is following in not settling these claims for cash.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. In just a minute. Now, in reference to the organization referred to as the personnel he said:

> We got very high-grade men on it, the members of the commission being Judge Walter D. Meals, formerly justice of the appellate court of Ohio—

Now, the very fact he comes from Ohio ought to be some indorsement of this administration.

Mr. BEGG. That is the reason I wanted to cut out the $50,000,000.

Mr. DICKINSON. Then he proceeds to say:

> Mr. Arthur W. Peele, of Patterson, Peele & Dennis, and vice president of the American Institute of Accountants; Mr. Homer L. Ferguson, president of the Newport News Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co.; Capt. R. M. Watt, formerly chief constructor of the Navy; and Mr. F. W. Wood, of Baltimore, formerly president of the Maryland Steel Co.

Now, let us go into this matter a little bit. It has been suggested by gentlemen that they would vote additional funds to create a new Court of Claims or an additional Court of Claims in order that these claims could be settled; but we have that commission already created. We have in it a personnel that is just as good as the Court of Claims. There is no more reason for saying these men are dishonest and will pay unjust claims than to say that the Court of Claims is dishonest, because they are organized in the same way, they are officials in the Government, they have sworn to do their duty, and not only that, but when the Court of Claims renders judgment the Government is bound by its finding—and I challenge any man to impugn any of these men—when this Court of Claims makes its finding its finding must be reviewed by the Shipping Board itself, which makes a double safeguard that this Court of Claims will not allow an unjust claim. You have either to do one of two things here. You have either got to say this whole thing is not worthy of the confidence of this House or you have got to say we have formulated a system here that at least equitably and properly safeguards the Treasury of the United States in the adjustment of these claims.

Now, if you put this in the Court of Claims, what does it mean? It means that these adjustments will not be made for two or three years, and you are going to have this thing stuck up here under the nostrils of Congress every year until all these claims are adjusted and the whole thing is taken care of. Now, here is the statement, and I believe this man knows what he is talking about, that if we will give him this personnel and permit him to work this thing out in this way he will adjust these claims before January 1, 1923, and that this phase, at least, of the Shipping Board will be taken out of Congress and will be disposed of. If you want to continue this thing in the same uncertain way in which all Government claims are paid, then go ahead and defeat this provision. If you want it to be adjusted in an orderly manner, under men that are just as honest as any men you can select, then support this proposition.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, in the month of August last, when the Committee on Appropriations reported an appropriation for $48,500,000 for the Shipping Board, we had a proviso that no part of that appropriation should be used for the payment of claims. I suggested then that I believed that all claims should be settled in the Court of Claims. Since that time the Committee on Appropriations has made a somewhat extensive investigation as to the situation in respect to pending claims. We find that there is $219,000,000 of claims pending, some of which, I assume, have very little merit, but some of which have great merit. Some of these claims are pressing. The honor of the Nation is at stake in connection with these matters. The question arises, Is the Nation willing to have it said of it that it is not willing to pay its just obligations? If we are not willing to have that said, the next question arises, How are we going to dispose of the obligations and what method shall be applied in their adjustment? Shall we send them to the Court of Claims or shall we try the cases before the board already in existence? Shall we send these claims to the Department of Justice to adjudicate or shall we permit the Shipping Board, the membership of which is familiar with the facts in all the cases, to adjust them? The Shipping Board tells the Committee on Appropriations that they have information which leads them to conclude that if they are given the power and the means that they will be able to do with $50,000,000 what they might not otherwise be able to do with double or treble that amount. The gentleman from Ohio, my friend Mr. BEGG, a short time since stated on the floor that $3,000,000,000 has been paid out through the War Department in the settlement of claims. Now, no such sum as that has been paid. The claims did not amount to that.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment. And all the claims in the aggregate settled by the War Department have been settled on the basis of 14 cents on the dollar on the face of the claims.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I think the gentleman misunderstood me as saying three billion. I said between two and three billion dollars, and I have a photostatic copy of the War Department record in my office, and I will be glad to put it in the RECORD or show it to the gentleman.

Mr. MADDEN. That was the face of the claims proposed.

Mr. BEGG. No; that is the amount of money paid out of the Treasury under the Dent Act. I have a photostatic copy of it.

Mr. MADDEN. I will be glad to have the gentleman put it in the RECORD. But whatever the amount was, the basis of settlement was at the rate of 14 cents on the dollar. Now, in the settlement of claims through the Treasury Department on building contracts, the settlements were made on the basis of over 60 cents on the dollar. The Shipping Board advises the Apppropriations Committee that they will be able to make settlements which will not be in excess of 32 cents on the dollar.

Mr. OLIVER. My understanding is that the net amount of the claims outstanding is about $219,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. That is what I said.

Mr. OLIVER. And of that number about $55,000,000 are in the admiralty court and about $62,000,000 in the Court of Claims, and that the Shipping Board is asking here, not for any money to settle any claim in either the admiralty court or in the Court of Claims, but that the sole purpose in asking for this appropriation is to have funds to settle $102,000,000 of outstanding claims.

Mr. MADDEN. It is $115,000,000.

Mr. OLIVER. As I have it, it is $102,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. The corrected figures are $115,000,000.

Mr. OLIVER. Then, that will be paying about 50 cents on the dollar?

Mr. MADDEN. Something over 40 cents.

Mr. OLIVER. In the hearings Mr. Lasker indicates it may be necessary to draw on the funds that we are authorizing them to realize on from the sale of ships in order to settle claims.

Mr. MADDEN. We have no funds.

Mr. OLIVER. However, this may not be sufficient to settle $115,000,000 of claims.

Mr. MADDEN. My information is that $115,000,000 will settle all the claims. We have $306,000,000 of resources in the form of notes, open accounts, mortgages, and in that it is presumed there will be $75,000,000 of a loss, so that we would have, if we will deduct $75,000,000 from the $306,000,000, about $231,000,000. If they could utilize this $231,000,000 on the payment of claims, of the $115,000,000, they would be able to get along without any of the appropriations suggested in this bill. But they can not collect the money. They will not be able to collect it for some years to come. If they could, they would have resources over the amount of the claims that are now pending. So we come to you with the recommendation that we give $50,000,000 to the Shipping Board now, $30,000,000 of which shall be immediately available, with the understanding they can use that to settle claims that are urgent, pressing, and just.

The only question is, Will you let the Shipping Board make these settlements? Will you let the board that has been appointed for that purpose make the settlements? Will you transfer the power to the Department of Justice to make the settlements? I say to you that the Shipping Board does not care. They do not want the obligation of settling the claims, if they can avoid it, but there seems to be no other way, and my judgment is that we ought to give them the amount recommended in this bill by the Appropriations Committee, and put the Government of the United States on a basis where it can stand before the world as willing to pay its obligations. [Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I rise to direct an inquiry to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD]. I am advised that the Weather Department of the Government has issued a storm warning to the effect that the already severe snowstorm is likely to be followed this afternoon by a 60-mile gale. I am also advised that all of the Government departments downtown have closed, and the employees have been permitted to go home. There are a great many Members here who live a long distance away, and I was wondering how long the gentleman from Indiana intends to stay in session this afternoon.

Mr. LANGLEY. And the indications show that it will snow for 24 hours yet.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I have no disposition to inconvenience any of the gentlemen here. If we can get a vote on this amendment, I will ask that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. STAFFORD). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] to strike out lines 23, 24, and 25 on page 28.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks for a division.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Pending that division, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I understand it is the intention to adjourn, and I withdraw the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] demands a division on the pending amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be again reported. There was so much confusion in the Hall that we could not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will again be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BEGG: Page 28, strike out lines 23, 24, and 25, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to which the gentleman from Indiana has no objection, as I understand it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 28, line 25, add a new paragraph, to read as follows:

"No part of the funds appropriated or made available in this act for the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be expended for the preparation, printing, publication, or distribution of any bulletins, newspapers, magazines, journals, or other periodicals, or for services in connection therewith, not including, however, the preparation and printing of documents and reports authorized and required to be issued by law."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK. I had an amendment to offer to the text. I understand that is a new paragraph. I would like to know if I can submit my amendment in advance of the new paragraph offered.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MANN). The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 28, line 25, after the word "available," strike out the period and insert "Provided, That no claim shall be paid out of the amount appropriated herein unless the Shipping Board shall find that such claim grew out of an agreement, express or implied, entered into with the United States Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation or their legal representatives."

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment, and I now move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana reserves a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. The gentleman from Indiana moves that the committee do now rise. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MANN, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9981) making appropriations for the Executive and for sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I take it that all the gentlemen understand that this bill will be taken up on Monday morning instead of the District bill, as was proposed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, January 30, 1922, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. GREENE of Vermont: Committee on Military Affairs. H. R. 8924. A bill to amend the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes," approved March 30, 1920; without amendment (Rept. No. 630). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON: Committee on the Judiciary. H. R. 10159. A bill to further protect interstate and foreign commerce against bribery and other corrupt trade practices; without amendment (Rept. No. 631). Referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. EDMONDS: Committee on Claims. S. 160. An act for the relief of Kristina Furjak; without amendment (Rept. No. 628). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House.

SENATE.

(Legislative day of Wednesday, January 25, 1922.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m., on the expiration of the recess.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of Washington in the chair). The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	France	McKellar	Sheppard
Ball	Frelinghuysen	McKinley	Shields
Brandegee	Glass	McLean	Smoot
Broussard	Hale	McNary	Spencer
Bursum	Harreld	Moses	Sutherland
Cameron	Harris	Nelson	Swanson
Capper	Harrison	Nicholson	Townsend
Caraway	Heflin	Norris	Wadsworth
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Warren
Dial	Kenyon	Pepper	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	Keyes	Phipps	Watson, Ind.
Edge	Ladd	Pittman	Weller
Elkins	La Follette	Poindexter	Willis
Ernst	Lenroot	Ransdell
Fernald	McCumber	Robinson

Mr. DIAL. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. SMITH] is detained on business of the Senate. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. PITTMAN. I was requested to announce that the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] is absent on account of illness, and that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks concerning a feature of the matter to which I have heretofore directed attention. It is contended on the other side of the Chamber, as I understand, that though the making of the agreement, such as is contemplated by the bill before us, falls within the treaty-making power—that is to say, the agreement might be made by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—it may also be made by congressional action through a commission appointed under the authority of an act of Congress. That is to say, Mr. President, the power of making agreements or contracts with foreign powers is concurrent, that the treaty-making power may be exercised with respect to certain contracts, at least, by the Congress.

I lay down the proposition that the treaty-making power vested by the Constitution in the President and the Senate is exclusive, and entirely so. The whole power is vested in the President and the Senate.

I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the context of the Constitution in that part of it dealing with the treaty-making power. It is found in section 2 of Article II as follows:

> The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States.

I apprehend that no one will contend that that is anything but exclusive. I dare say no one will have the hardihood to say that Congress may by act appoint some one other than the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator, although I wish that I might follow this line of argument.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was merely going to ask one question on that immediate point. I think anyone would agree with the Senator on the proposition laid down, but I suppose the Senator will agree with the proposition that Congress could pass a law directing the policy of its military forces?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The policy of the military forces? I admit nothing of the kind. The Commander in Chief can not be controlled by Congress in relation to the operation of the Army.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator hold that Congress could not forbid an expedition of its military forces in some foreign country or direct such an expedition?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Congress may declare war against a foreign country, but the carrying out of the war is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the President of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Consequently the power of the President as Commander in Chief is limited and subject to the laws of Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, it is subject to the laws of Congress passed in accordance with the Constitution.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is all we contend for.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But if the Congress of the United States endeavors to invade the powers of the President of the United States as Commander in Chief, such action is not within the power of Congress. I continue:

> He may require the opinion, in writing, of the principal officer in each of the executive departments upon any subject relating to the duties of their respective offices, and he shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States except in cases of impeachment.

Does anybody contend that that is not an exclusive power? Is it within the power of Congress to pass a general law granting pardons to persons who are convicted of offenses against the Government of the United States?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say there is pending before this body now a resolution requesting the President to exercise Executive clemency toward what are known as political offenders; but if we have the power to release such offenders, why not immediately pass an act discharging them from custody?

I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator in connection with the pardoning power—which, I admit, is exclusively in the hands of the President—would the Senator say that the fact that the President has that power exclusively prevents Congress from legally passing any law that might have any effect upon the President's exercise of his power, as, for illustration, would it be within the province of Congress to pass a law that should provide for the publicity of all recommendations and all resolutions by organizations of men and women, requesting the President to pardon certain offenders?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have no doubt Congress has that power. I have no doubt also that, within certain limits, Congress may regulate the pardoning power. I continue reading from the Constitution:

> He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur—

And in that same connection the clause continues—

> and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The last clause relates to inferior officers, but with respect to all officers who are not inferior officers the power of the President is exclusive. These are all exclusive powers.

Mr. President, that very matter came before the Congress of the United States in the celebrated Fitz-John Porter case. A bill was pending before Congress and actually passed, I believe, and went to the President for his signature, restoring Fitz-John Porter to his place as an officer of the Army of the United States. The President called upon the then Attorney General, Mr. Brewster, who was recognized as one of the great lawyers who have held that place, and he advised the President of the United States that Congress had absolutely nothing to do with that matter; that Congress had no power to provide that a certain man should be appointed an officer in the Army of the United States. After discussing the subject the Attorney General said in that connection:

The effect of the bill, then, is to authorize the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Fitz-John Porter to the position of colonel in the Army of the same grade and rank held by him at the time of his dismissal therefrom by the sentence, leaving it discretionary with the President to also place him on the retired list of the Army as of that grade. It supplies the President and the Senate with the authority to that extent to "carry into effect the recommendation of said board" through the exercise of the appointing power.

* * * * * * *

In answer to this it is submitted that Congress can not impose such requirement, and thus virtually assume a power (that of making an appointment to office) which does not constitutionally belong to it. Furthermore, if the bill be viewed as making it imperative upon the President to appoint, it must be deemed to make it equally imperative upon the Senate to "advise and consent" thereto. But these terms imply the right to exercise judgment and discretion, with which right such requirement would be inconsistent.

And he concludes as follows:

From the "foregoing powers" conferred upon Congress the power to designate by law a person to fill a military office can not be implied, since this would be in direct conflict with the power of appointment expressly given the President as above. Regarding the bill as imposing or attempting to impose upon the President a duty to appoint the person designated therein, it is without any support in the Constitution. It is an assumption of an implied power which is not based upon any express power and clearly invades the constitutional rights of the President.

The whole subject received the consideration of Judge Pomery in his celebrated work on the Constitution, from which I read at section 630, as follows:

The Constitution declares that the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States. The meaning of this clause is that he is the head of that department, that all its powers and functions immediately or mediately center in him, and that he, and he alone, is ultimately responsible for their due execution.

Going on to consider the question of foreign relations, he says at section 669:

All foreign relations are thus confided exclusively to the President, or to him in connection with the Senate.

Bear in mind, "all foreign relations are thus confided exclusively to the President, or to him in connection with the Senate."

Congress as such has no voice in or control over these matters, except the secondary power or duty of passing laws in certain instances to carry out the provisions of treaties.

At section 679 he says:

So far as those external relations affect the internal, and so far as the measures appropriate in exercising the function of controlling the external relations act within the interior and upon private persons and rights, just so far has the Government all the power under the Constitution which the exigencies of any occasion can demand. Where the act is legislative in its nature the Congress may legislate; where the act is executive in its nature the President may execute.

That is all I care to say, Mr. President, upon the contention made here that this is a concurrent and not an exclusive power which is vested in the President and the Senate.

KNICKERBOCKER THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I desire to submit a resolution concerning the terrible disaster of Saturday night which has so profoundly shocked the city of Washington and the whole country. I think that the Congress has a responsibility in this connection that can not be evaded. We should know the facts, and, if anyone is to blame, it is the duty of the Congress or of the officials here in the city of Washington to find out just who is to blame and to place the responsibility. In order to bring about a thorough, a searching, and an immediate investigation, I ask unanimous consent at this time to submit a resolution and have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Out of order, the Senator from Kansas asks unanimous consent to present a resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 229) was read, as follows:

Whereas the tragedy at the Knickerbocker Theater last Saturday evening, January 28, 1922, resulting in the death of not less than 109 persons, and the serious injury of many others, has profoundly shocked the people of Washington and the entire Nation; and

Whereas the explanation that snow, although of an extraordinary quantity, was the chief cause of the collapse of the roof, appears to be unsatisfactory; and

Whereas it is currently reported that contractors and builders, especially during and since the World War, have ignored, evaded, or treated lightly the rules and regulations provided in the building code of the District of Columbia, especially those sections which make mandatory provision for assurance against such a terrible calamity as has just occurred; and

Whereas it has been persistently rumored that contractors and builders, determined to save money on the erection of residence and building structures, have acted in collusion with inspectors of buildings employed by the District of Columbia; and

Whereas it is the imperative duty of the Senate of the United States to know all the facts relating to this inexcusable tragedy, and also to learn what, if any, truth there is in the repeated assertions that the safety and health of thousands of citizens and residents of the District of Columbia have been jeopardized by the actions of careless contractors, builders, and building inspectors: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to make a searching investigation into the Knickerbocker Theater tragedy, including the operations of builders, contractors, and building inspectors, especially in relation to structures erected during and since the World War; be it further

Resolved, That the said committee be authorized to employ such expert and other help as may in its judgment be needed to obtain all the facts connected with the disaster, and that the expenses of the investigation be paid from the contingent fund of the United States Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I understand the Senator who has submitted the resolution is a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, is he not?

Mr. CAPPER. I am.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. May I ask the Senator if he has any knowledge of the present building laws of the city of Washington and how they are administered?

Mr. CAPPER. I have not any intimate knowledge on the subject of the building laws.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair must observe at this point that the resolution necessarily must be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to ask the Senator a question for information.

Mr. CAPPER. I repeat, in answer to the question of the Senator from New Jersey, that I have not any intimate knowledge concerning the matter to which he has referred. I have heard a great many rumors, though, in the last day or two that the laws of this city are not what they should be, and that their enforcement under the few regulations which have been established has been lax. It is a subject that should be thoroughly inquired into by some committee of the Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I think that the proposed investigation should be a widespread one of the entire city government. I do not know under what committee of Congress jurisdiction of the subject would naturally fall, but I think the time has come in this city—and I speak as a property holder—when some committee of Congress should make an investigation looking to an improvement of the administration of the municipal laws of this city.

According to official records at the present time, there are twice as many automobile accidents in the city of Washington as in any other city of similar size in the country. There are, perhaps, deficiencies in the traffic laws and a laxity in their administration. There is no requirement whereby those who drive cars in this city shall be examined or qualified in any way for that purpose, such as exists in other cities.

I know from personal knowledge that there are in this city at the present time many buildings that are fire traps, and if at any time fire should occur there will be a great loss of life. The city has grown far beyond its proportions of 10 years ago. It is time that Congress should pay some attention to this matter, and that some civic leadership should be established to give protection to the citizens who reside here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico subsequently, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred the resolution (S. Res. 229) to investigate the Knickerbocker Theater tragedy and building operations during and since the World War, reported it without amendment.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS (S. DOC. NO. 122).

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I present the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9724) making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes. I do not present the report for action at this time, but shall call it up at some convenient time hereafter.

The report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9724) "making appropriations for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 8, 14, 19, 24, and 25.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 5, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 15, 16, 17, 18, 22, and 23; and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 7, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment, insert the following: "$4,000,000: Provided, That for purpose of concentration, upon the initiation of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and under regulations prescribed by him, distilled spirits may be removed from any internal-revenue bonded warehouse to any other such warehouse, and may be bottled in bond in any such warehouse before or after payment of the tax, and the commissioner shall prescribe the form and penal sums of bond covering distilled spirits in internal-revenue bonded warehouse, and in transit between such warehouses"; and the Senate agree to the same.

The committee of conference have not agreed upon amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 20, and 21.

F. E. WARREN,
W. L. JONES,
WM. J. HARRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

MARTIN B. MADDEN,
WALTER W. MAGEE,
JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
Managers on the part of the House.

PETITIONS.

Mr. LADD presented a resolution adopted by the Wisconsin Hemp Order, of Madison, Wis., favoring an appropriation of $15,000 for the investigation of flax straw for paper and pulp, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented 25 petitions of sundry citizens of North Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation reviving the Government Grain Corporation so as to stabilize prices of certain farm products, which were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

BUREAU OF AERONAUTICS.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (S. 3076) to create a Bureau of Aeronautics in the Department of Commerce, to encourage and regulate the operation of civil aircraft in interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 460) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3084) to authorize and provide for the payment of the amounts expended in the construction of hangars and the maintenance of flying fields for the use of the air mail service of the Post Office Department; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 3085) for the relief of Thomas M. Hewitt, jr.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BALL:

A bill (S. 3086) providing for the removal of snow and ice from the paved sidewalks of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. KING:

A bill (S. 3087) to prevent further seizures by the Alien Property Custodian; and

A bill (S. 3088) to provide for the return of enemy property seized during the war; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HARRISON:

A bill (S. 3089) to provide for the appointment of a district judge in the northern and southern judicial districts in the State of Mississippi, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, announced that on January 27, 1922, the President approved and signed bills of the following titles:

S. 1099. An act to amend section 2372 of the Revised Statutes; and

S. 2133. An act adding lands to the State of Texas and ceding jurisdiction to the State of Texas over certain lands or bancos heretofore or hereafter acquired by the United States of America from the United States of Mexico.

ADJUSTMENT OF FOREIGN LOANS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8762) to create a commission authorized under certain conditions to refund or convert obligations of foreign Governments owing to the United States of America, and for other purposes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I have an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which I do not care to offer until all other amendments shall have been disposed of, because any other amendment offered to the bill would take precedence over the one which I intend to offer. Therefore I have not offered it formally; but there seems to be no other amendment, although several Senators have spoken on other amendments which they intended to offer.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have just received information from the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] that he is snowbound on his way to the city. He would like to have a vote on the amendment which he has proposed, and which I understand is lying on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have an amendment to offer, which I shall be glad to offer at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to make inquiry in regard to the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. He has offered an amendment. It may be that he is likewise snowbound.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can state that the Senator from North Carolina is not able to get here. There has been no traffic over the Baltimore Pike, and the trains from Muirkirk are annulled until 2 o'clock. The Senator from North Carolina hopes that by 2 o'clock he may be able to get a train and arrive here about 3 o'clock. As we all know, he is very anxious regarding some amendments which he has proposed. I am advised that he desires to discuss one of those amendments before the Senate prior to the taking of a vote; and unless there is some other matter in connection with this bill which can be disposed of without any objection from any source, I believe that out of consideration to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] this bill should be temporarily laid aside. It is through no fault of theirs that they are not here, and we all know that they are anxious to be heard and to vote upon these amendments. This is Monday morning, and unless some Senator can present some good reason otherwise I would suggest that we temporarily lay aside this bill and take up the calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order to prevent future misunderstandings, the Chair begs leave to suggest to the Senator from New Mexico that we are now operating under a unanimous-consent agreement which limits speeches after 3 o'clock to-day to 20 minutes upon the bill and 10 minutes upon any amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I recall the unanimous-consent agreement, and I do not see how that would interfere with temporarily laying aside the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair, it would not; but the Chair felt it his duty to call attention to the fact that after 3 o'clock to-day the speeches are limited.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to say just a word, and then I will yield. I will yield the floor, so far as that is concerned.

As I said when I first rose, I have an amendment upon which I have addressed the Senate. When it comes before the Senate for a vote I desire to take a few minutes to explain it to those who were not present when I talked on the subject the other day; but it is an amendment by way of substitute. If I offered it now the bill would still be subject to any amendment that might be offered and the vote would have to be taken on such amendments prior to taking a vote on the amendment that I shall offer, and for that reason I have not formally offered it. I am aware of the fact that the Senator from North Carolina has taken a deep interest in this bill. He is a member of the committee. He has devoted considerable attention to it in the Senate in discussing it. The Senator from California has an amendment upon which he has addressed the Senate at considerable length, and I think he is deeply interested in it. Both of these Senators are detained from the Senate because of the storm. They are in no way to blame for their own absence. I would not want to take advantage of either one of them under the circumstances; and I was going to suggest that unless some Senator wants to discuss the bill, or some amendment to it, we ought either to lay it aside or to take a recess until 3 o'clock, to give these Senators an opportunity to get here. I do not know whether they will be able to get here then or not.

We are not under any unanimous-consent agreement now, but we will be at 3 o'clock; but that unanimous-consent agreement is not one that provides for a final vote upon the passage of the bill, and hence can be changed at any time by another unanimous-consent agreement and can be modified. As I understand the rule, it can be modified without notice. We did not call the roll for the purpose of entering into this unanimous-consent agreement. It is not a final determination of the bill itself, and I think it can be modified at any time.

While I am perfectly willing to go ahead and I do not like the delay—for it seems to me we have had too much delay—here is an act of God that has prevented Senators who are interested in the bill from being here. It is impossible for them to get here, and it seems to me it would be manifestly unfair for us to proceed without them. Unless some Senator desires to speak on the bill, if the Senator in charge of the bill does not feel disposed to do so I shall myself submit a unanimous-consent agreement to wait until these Senators can be present.

Mr. McCUMBER and Mr. OVERMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is no desire and no expectation of taking the slightest advantage of the enforced absence of any Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I knew there was not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I had hoped that even though the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] might not be able to come to the Senate Chamber before 2 or 3 o'clock, still we might dispose, not of the amendments, but of some of the speeches that are to be made upon the amendments prior to that time, and thus save a little time after the hour of 3 o'clock, when the speeches are to be limited. I have not the slightest objection to a unanimous-consent agreement that the bill may be temporarily laid aside until 3 o'clock, and then we would operate under the unanimous-consent agreement. Of course, if any Senator wants to speak on it in the meantime, he can do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that it is impossible for my colleague [Mr. SIMMONS] to get here before 3 o'clock, as the trains have all been annulled and he can not get in in his car. As the Senator from Nebraska says, this unanimous-consent agreement was not correctly entered into. I could make a point of order against it, because the roll was not called. Senators all remember that. It is really no unanimous-consent agreement under the rules.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; it is.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that he is mistaken. It is not necessary to call the roll except when there is a unanimous-consent agreement as to the time the vote is to be taken, and there is no such agreement in this case.

Mr. OVERMAN. I think the Senator is right about that. I will ask the Senator if he will not agree to continue the unanimous-consent agreement until 3 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say that I entirely agree with the Senator from North Dakota. If some Senator wants to address the Senate on the bill at this time, I do not want to hinder him from doing so; but evidently there is not, or he would have taken the floor before I took it. I now ask unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily laid aside until 3 o'clock.

Mr. McCUMBER. And then that it will be taken up under the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it would come up then under such an agreement.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, can there not be a unanimous-consent agreement to take up the bill to-morrow at 3 o'clock? Will the Senator agree to that? Then we could all be here.

Mr. McCUMBER. We could not very well change the unanimous-consent agreement unless we were certain that we had every one here who was here when we made the original agreement.

Mr. OVERMAN. Could not the unanimous-consent agreement be set aside by unanimous consent?

Mr. McCUMBER. It undoubtedly could be, but it would not be a fair proposition. I could not consent to that; and, with the liberality which we all enjoy in the discussion of any matter at any time, I am certain that if the Senator from North Carolina is not here at the time his amendment relative to the soldiers' compensation bill is taken up, he will have opportunity to discuss it at some other time, and he has discussed every other feature of the bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am sure the Senator does not want to take advantage of the weather and the conditions prevailing that prevent my colleague from being here to discuss this question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope he can get here. Trains are running regularly now between Baltimore and Washington. The track is open. I am informed that the Senator is at Muirkirk, a little station where only a few of the trains stop.

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have not the slightest doubt, however, that if he will telephone over to Baltimore he can get one of the trains to stop and take him on.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope he can. I do not know how that is.

Mr. NORRIS. At least, by that time we can get some definite word regarding our action.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I should like to state that if Senators think it best I will offer the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] on his behalf. He spoke on it the other day. I am not favorable to the amendment, but I will offer it for him.

Mr. NORRIS. No, Mr. President; I would not want to agree to that. The Senator from California probably feels as I do about the amendment that I shall propose. He perhaps desires to avail himself of the unanimous-consent agreement. I do not know that he does; I have not talked with him about it; but he probably desires to explain the amendment somewhat when we vote on it, and I think we ought to take no action that would prevent him from doing so. The same thing is true of the Senator from North Carolina. I have been informed that the Senator from North Carolina expected to address the Senate to-day on the subject of at least one of his amendments. He tried the other day to get his amendment formally before the Senate, and he did not succeed in doing so, because finally there was an agreement between himself and the Senator from North Dakota that the committee amendment which had been agreed to should not be formally reconsidered at that time, but that it would be when we reached the place in the consideration of the bill where we could expect an immediate vote upon the amendment that the Senator from North Carolina desires to offer.

I ask that my request be stated to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until 3 o'clock. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Mexico will state his inquiry

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to know if the Senate could, by unanimous consent now, defer for one day the consideration of the bill and the previous unanimous-consent agreement; or, in other words, consider this day as not applying to the bill under consideration?

Mr. McCUMBER. I could not agree to such a modification of the unanimous-consent agreement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will answer the inquiry. The present occupant of the chair is of the opinion that the existing unanimous-consent agreement can be modified by another unanimous-consent agreement without the day's notice required in Rule XII.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I should like to submit to the Senate the advisability of deferring this bill, as well as the unanimous-consent agreement, for one day, considering this day as not applying to the arrangement we made on Saturday.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to the Senator that he refrain from making his request at the present time. Let the request which I have suggested be agreed to, and if at 3 o'clock the Senators for whom we lay the business aside are not able to be here, we can take up for consideration the Senator's request at that time. Those Senators, so far as I know, are the only Senators who have been prevented by the storm from being here, and if they come it will be unnecessary to put the matter over for another day.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will state the reason why I make the suggestion at this time. We know now that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] can not get here before 3 o'clock. The conditions are such that they may not be able to reach here at that time. If they should come, in all probability in order to dispose of the bill we would have to remain in session until a rather late hour, and traffic conditions in the city of Washington are such that I apprehend other Members of the Senate would not care to remain in this part of the city until dark. It would inconvenience those of us who are here to have a late session this afternoon, and it is quite apparent that if we take the matter up at 3 o'clock, even under the unanimous-consent agreement, it would be a great inconvenience to many of us who are here to remain until the bill is disposed of. We have no assurance that the absent Senators can get here at 3 o'clock. That is the earliest possible hour at which they can get here.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, let me make a suggestion. Probably if those Senators do not get here, the Senator from North Dakota will agree that we shall take a recess until to-morrow. There is nothing in the unanimous-consent agreement which would prevent us from taking a recess.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What I was seeking to accomplish was that we might be able to advise the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] by phone, if possible, that they need not make the effort to get here after 3 o'clock. I believe that will appeal to the judgment of Senators, and that we should not, under the circumstances, impose upon those two absent Senators the extraordinary effort to get here at such a late hour in the day. I should like, if the Senate will agree, that some such arrangement as that shall be entered into. It seems to me that to insist upon going ahead and leaving the matter in an uncertain condition until 3 o'clock would be an injustice to those Senators.

We might take up the calendar and go through that to-day. I apprehend there are many matters on the calendar which could be disposed of. The Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate can consider in a few minutes the resolution introduced by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] this morning, and doubtless make a report, and enable the Senate to dispose of that matter, which we all believe should be attended to at an early hour. There are many things on the calendar which should be considered, and I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator that one request for unanimous consent has been made, and I understand there can not be two requests for unanimous consent pending at the same time. We must dispose of one at a time. I would like to say to the Senator and to the Senate that, as far as I am concerned, if at 3 o'clock it is still impossible for the Senator from California and the Senator from North Carolina to be here, I shall be in favor of adjourning. Those Senators are deeply interested in this measure, one of them being a member of the committee which reported the bill. Both of them have given it a great deal of time and consideration, and both have amendments pending. I do not know how other Senators feel about it, but when Senators with such interest in a measure are prevented by a storm such as now prevails from being present, so that it is physically impossible for them to be here, I am not in favor of going ahead before they can be here.

I will agree with the Senator also that we ought to adjourn early to-day because Senators who are here will have some trouble to get home. Those who are situated as I am will perhaps have to walk 5 miles to get home, and they ought to start early to do that, especially in view of the fact that they have walked 5 miles to get here this morning.

I myself do not want the session to-day to run until late, and I do not believe other Senators do; but if those two Senators can come, and if they get here at 3 o'clock, we might just as well go on with the bill until the Senate wants to adjourn. There is nothing in the unanimous-consent agreement to prevent an adjournment. We can adjourn at this time if we want to do so, and the unanimous-consent agreement will be in force when we convene to-morrow. There is nothing which compels us to vote on this bill to-day. If at 3 o'clock the two Senators to whom I have referred are not here, and if the same conditions exist then which exist now, I am sure there will be a disposition on the part of the Senate either to take up something else or to adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator did not hear what I said regarding the propriety of insisting that those Senators who have not been able to get here shall have an opportunity to be present. We know they can not get here before 3 o'clock, and I suggested, as a matter of courtesy and fairness, really, that it would be inadvisable to ask those Senators to come to the Senate to-day, knowing that they can not arrive before 3 o'clock, because the Senator from Nebraska certainly realizes that even if they get here by 3 o'clock, we can not dispose of the bill to-day and adjourn at a reasonable hour.

Of course, if the Senator from Nebraska insists upon his method of dealing with the matter, I shall make no objection to it whatever; but I wanted to present my view to the Senate. It seems to me that we ought not to ask those Senators to make this extraordinary effort to get here at 3 o'clock, with no assurance when they can get back, how long we can stay here, and when the rest of us can get home to-day. But, of course, I defer, necessarily, to the judgment of other Senators in the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, on Friday the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] was prepared to agree that we should vote on that day at 3 o'clock. He was agreeable to have 3 o'clock on Saturday fixed as the hour when the vote should be taken. The storm came on, and we fixed on Monday at 3 o'clock. The two Senators referred to, the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I understand, have amendments pending. The Senator from North Carolina spoke, I think, three hours and a half on his amendment, and on the bill generally. The Senator from California completed his argument upon his amendment, and to as full a Senate as we usually have. I am informed that both those Senators have pairs, and therefore their absence would make no difference whatever in the final vote upon any amendment.

There are other Senators also who are interested in the final disposition of this measure. It does not seem to have occurred to the Senator from New Mexico that there are other Senators who have made arrangements to be absent to-morrow and who expect the vote to take place to-day. It is just as important to them when we have made a unanimous-consent agreement that we hold to that unanimous-consent agreement as it is to those who are necessarily absent, who have pairs, and who have fully argued their amendments. I believe that the Senators referred to can be here by 2 o'clock, as has already been suggested—that is, if they make a real earnest and honest attempt to get here—and if it should so happen that they can not be present they can utilize their pairs.

If there are any Senators who can speak now, and so shorten the time, so that we shall not have to be late after 3 o'clock, I hope they will proceed and discuss the matter from now until 3, when under the unanimous-consent agreement the speeches will be limited to 20 minutes. There is nothing to prevent that. We will hold the matter before the Senate right along for them, as long as anyone wants to speak, for an hour or five minutes, upon any proposition, and if no one does wish to speak at this time and it is desired that the bill shall be laid aside until 3 o'clock, I am perfectly willing to have that done and to have the measure taken up at that time under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Therefore, I am perfectly willing to follow the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the bill be temporarily laid aside until 3 o'clock this afternoon, to be then taken up under the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that, of course, would mean that in effect we would be shortening the opportunity of discussion. We could proceed now and run along until 3 o'clock, and then the 20-minute rule will apply anyway. I am sure the Senator does not want to shorten the opportunity to discuss the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the contrary, I suggested going right along if there is anyone ready to speak on the bill, and that any Senator shall speak as long as he may desire before 3 o'clock.

Mr. REED. From the spirit of the remarks which have been made, I presume we will do nothing of a definite nature anyway until 3 o'clock; but I want to say that I have been in the Senate long enough now to regard myself as an old Member, and I can very well remember that a few years back it was a common custom never to take up and dispose of a measure when any Senator who was necessarily absent wanted to speak upon it. That is a very good custom. We have our passages at arms and say things, as lawyers do in the trial of a case, which sometimes sound a little bitter, but the courtesies of the body and the decencies of the body ought to be preserved.

There is no question about the fact that an unprecedented storm has swept over Washington. The wonder to me is that there was a quorum of the Senate present on Saturday. I myself did not move out of my house, because the street in front of my house was impassable, and I assumed that the rest of the town was in the same condition. I could have put on a pair of waders, which I use sometimes when I go hunting, and made my way out, but I did not think there would be a quorum here. There ought to be no question about rearranging the unanimous consent so that we would preserve substantially the same condition as would have existed if there had been no storm intervening, and I hope that will be the spirit of the body. If it is not the spirit of the body, the day will come when we will find it very difficult to get unanimous-consent agreements, which have proven in the past to be a great means of expediting business.

I agree with the remarks of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES]. I think what he has suggested ought to be done. As far as I am concerned, I had a few observations to offer on the bill in conclusion of what I was saying the other day. I am entirely willing to proceed and conclude what I have to say, unless some one desires that another measure shall be taken up.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in view of the statement of the Senator from Missouri that he desires to proceed now, I withdraw the request for unanimous consent presented by me a few moments ago.

Mr. REED. I am willing to give way to other business; but I can proceed with what I have to say, if that will save any time.

Mr. NORRIS. I withdraw the request, Mr. President, and I hope the Senator from Missouri will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I had about concluded my remarks the other day in regard to the pending bill, but there are one or two arguments to which I wish to refer.

The Secretary of the Treasury has insisted that there are certain countries able to pay their interest beginning within six months from this date or from the dates the bonds are accepted. Among those countries he has named Great Britain. He has insisted that there are other countries which will find it utterly impossible to make interest payments for some time in the future, and that, therefore, he must be allowed the right to fix interest payments at such time as may suit himself. He argues that if a country were to give its bonds and then default in its interest it would embarrass that country and would result in an act of bankruptcy. In part I answered that argument on Friday, but let me make one or two observations with reference to it now.

In the first place, every one of those countries is now in default. It is very true that at the time they obtained the money they did not issue bonds in regular form, but it is also true that they solemnly agreed in writing to issue bonds containing substantially the same terms and conditions as the bonds issued by the American Government and sold to the American people. Over three years have passed by and that solemn obligation has been in default every minute of that time.

It is claimed by way of excuse that the Secretary of the Treasury through some agent entered into negotiations with various foreign Governments with relation to the giving of bonds and that at some point in those negotiations this agent undertook to say to the representatives of the foreign Governments that our Government might be willing to extend the time of payment. Thereupon one of the representatives of Great Britain, of course, readily accepted the suggestion, and further indicated that he would like to have three years instead of two years of a delay of interest. But the agent who was speaking for the American Government did nothing more than make a suggestion, which he undoubtedly intended to refer to the proper American authority; and in this instance that authority would necessarily have been the House of Representatives and the Senate. Even if he had assumed to speak for the American Government, he did so entirely without any legal authority whatsoever. His act was an absolute nullity.

An examination, however, of what transpired will, in my judgment, convince any fair-minded man there was no attempt on the part of this representative of the Treasury Department to commit the American Government to a postponement of the payment of interest. However, under all the circumstances, in view of the turmoil of the war and the exigencies surrounding foreign countries, there was no complaint—at least, no general complaint—made of this action.

As the matter now stands, therefore, these foreign countries are already in default on their solemn obligations in two respects. First, they have failed to deliver to us the bonds stipulated in the written instruments executed, and, second, they are in default in the payment of interest. If, therefore, all of the foreign Governments were to deliver to the United States Treasury their bonds stipulating for the payment of interest beginning, let us say, six months from this date, they only would have issued in due and proper form obligations which are in compliance with a written obligation already existing, duly signed and duly filed with the Treasury. They merely would have changed the form of the instrument and agreed to do what they are already solemnly bound to do by their written instruments delivered to us at the time the money was obtained. There is, therefore, no merit whatever in the claim that those Governments, by issuing new obligations in proper form, will in any manner place themselves in an embarrassing position even if they should fail in the future to pay the interest upon the new obligations in accordance with the terms written therein.

The second proposition——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves his first proposition, will he yield to me?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it not furthermore true that the obligation which those nations have signed contains a statement that they will, in case of the nonpayment of interest, put the amount of accumulated interest in additional bonds?

Mr. REED. I do not think that is in the original obligation, I may be in error.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me read it.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad if the Senator will read it. It has been some time since I looked at it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is the wording of the obligation:

> The Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of ——— on demand, with interest from the date hereof, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Such principal sum and the interest thereon will be paid at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York, or, at the option of the holder, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington, in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness, or at the option of the holder, at the Bank of England, London, England, in pounds sterling at the fixed rate of $4.76\frac{1}{2}$ to the pound sterling, and at any such place of payment without deduction for any British taxes, present or future.
> This certificate will be converted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, at par, with an adjustment of accrued interest, into an equal par amount of 5 per cent convertible gold bonds of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland conforming to the provisions of acts of Congress of the United States known, respectively, as second Liberty bond act, third Liberty bond act, and fourth Liberty bond act.

I draw that to the Senator's attention for the purpose of showing not only that the Treasury at that time interpreted the Secretary as having power to accept bonds for accrued interest, but that that specification was written into the contract signed by the United States and other countries.

Mr. REED. That simply strengthens the position for which I have been arguing, and, in my judgment, if there is any virtue in written contracts, settles the proposition. I am much obliged to the Senator. While I have been quite familiar with the contract from which he has just read, it has been some months since I have examined it, and the particular language had escaped my recollection. But without any specific provision it would follow as of course that whosoever borrows money and agrees to pay 5 per cent interest for it and does not pay the interest must either pay the interest or he must at least execute his obligation for it.

The other proposition advanced by the Secretary is that for some mysterious reason, if the countries issue their bonds and then default in the interest on those bonds, that will place them in a desperate condition. Mr. President, that is like saying that a bankrupt is put in a worse condition if he executes his note for the amount of his debt. The argument answers itself and requires no discussion from me. The bankrupt who can obtain the consent of his creditor to a settlement giving him further time, and who is only asked to execute his note for the amount, is an exceedingly fortunate bankrupt, indeed. He has a creditor who is singularly indulgent.

But, says the Secretary of the Treasury, if they are once defaulted, these bonds will go to a great discount in the market. What is there in that argument? The bonds will necessarily be held by our own Treasury, and whether they go to a discount or not they will be just as good and just as bad, just as valuable and just as worthless, as is the credit of the country itself. The credit of a borrowing country itself all depends in the last analysis upon the ability of the country to pay.

The final argument made by the Secretary of the Treasury is that he will find it necessary to make different terms of payment and different arrangements with reference to interest with the different countries, and that he must have a free hand in order to make those arrangements. The vice of that argument is that it proposes to put into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury the power practically to give away millions, hundreds of millions, or perhaps billions of dollars of the money or credits of the American people.

The power to postpone the payment of interest indefinitely is a power virtually to extinguish the principal. If A owes B $100,000 which would nominally draw 6 per cent interest, and B agrees to postpone the payment of any interest for 10 years of time, the result is that he has given the principal of the sum to A, because the interest on $100,000 for 10 years' time at 6 per cent, if compounded, will more than equal the principal.

"But," says the Secretary, "I must make different arrangements, and, therefore, I should be permitted to agree with Great Britain to-day that she shall pay the interest at once; with France that she shall pay interest in the near future; with certain other countries that they shall not pay the interest for a long time in the future; and I shall be greatly embarrassed in my arrangements if I must act in accordance with a hard-and-fast rule laid down by Congress."

To my mind, if Congress lays down a hard-and-fast rule and says to the Secretary of the Treasury "You shall treat them all alike," it will assist the Secretary of the Treasury in making his settlements. He can go to the various debtor countries and say to them, "Here is my warrant of authority, outside of it I can not go; Congress has demanded that there shall be taken an obligation and that it shall contain certain terms, among which is the stipulation the interest shall become payable at certain fixed periods, beginning at a certain fixed date." With that sort of instruction from his principal, he can insist that the debtor countries shall immediately issue their bonds and agree to pay the interest. Therefore, an act of Congress such as is proposed to be embraced in the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] will aid the Secretary of the Treasury in insisting upon a settlement that shall provide for the payment of interest; and, Mr. President, it ought to be of great assistance to him.

Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury sits down with the English commissioner and proposes to exact from Great Britain the payment of interest in the immediate future; suppose that the English commissioner says to him, "Great Britain insists on being treated as well as other nations; there is no reason a burden should be put upon us which is not imposed on other nations; we are entitled, by comity at least, to the 'most-favored nation' treatment." Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury, being driven to it, is compelled to admit that he intends to give France an extension; that he intends to give Italy an extension; that he intends to give Czechoslovakia a still further and greater extension; will he not be placed in a position of great embarrassment; in a position that will, in fact, be defenseless? But, on the other hand, if he is able to say to Great Britain, "We insist upon treating all nations alike and you, as the greatest of our debtors, and the greatest of the nations outside of the United States, must set the example of coming to the table and settling with us in accordance with the terms of your written agreement." If he should take that latter position, Great Britain will be in no situation to refuse to come to a settlement at once.

Now, let us suppose that it so happens that Czechoslovakia is unable to pay its interest when due or that any other country is similarly situated, there will be, of course, a default in that interest; but we will not send our armies and navies over to collect the interest; the interest will simply be in default, just as it is in default at this blessed moment. The interest will be defaulted upon a bond just as the interest is now defaulted upon a solemn written obligation which binds the honor of every nation that has subscribed to that instrument.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not looked this matter up recently, but the Senator from Missouri will remember that when a bill introduced by him was being given consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary, and, I think, afterwards by the Committee on Finance, the papers by which the credits to these foreign nations were established were produced before the committee. Does the Senator happen to remember whether the evidences of debt held by the United States provided for the payment of interest?

Mr. REED. Yes; I have the document here. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] read it a few moments ago.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I beg pardon. My attention was diverted at the time and I did not hear it. What was that provision?

Mr. REED. I will answer the Senator by reading the clause, which is as follows:

> The Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland—
>
> These documents are all similar—
> for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of ——— on demand, with interest from the date hereof at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

Then follows the provision as to just how the debt shall be paid.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Missouri says that under that agreement these debtors are now in default as to the interest. This is, of course, a very difficult subject to arrange satisfactorily upon either theory; that is, whether the debtor nations agreed to pay interest, and do not pay it, or whether they said nothing about the times of the payment of interest, and do not pay it. I wish to ask the Senator, then, if some of these powers know now that they will not be able to pay interest, either semiannually, in what position will it place them in negotiations with our country? If the Secretary is instructed to agree upon extensions and to accept new evidences of the debt, if he is compelled to provide that such new evidences shall contain a provision that the interest shall be payable semiannually or annually, then the nation which knows that it will not be able to pay it within a month hence or a year is going to be required, is it not, to agree to something that it admits that it can not perform, and will not that be rather embarrassing as to a number of the powers? On the other hand, I can see if Congress says nothing whatever about the requirement as to the payment of the interest or as to the time when the interest on the loan shall be paid, the powers abroad may take the view, "It was proposed in Congress that we should pay interest semiannually or annually, and that proposition was voted down; therefore the United States does not expect us to pay the interest annually or semiannually, and we will take our time about it." So it seems to me that we are between two alternatives, neither one of which is very cheerful or roseate.

Mr. REED. I think that there is no difficulty about it, with all respect in the world to my very good and very able friend. I was saying that if new bonds are executed, and if we find that there is a default in the interest we will not send our Army and Navy over to conquer and devastate the country which is in default. We will have the obligation, and we will be at an end of caviling and trifling about it. We will then say to the debtor nation: "Pay as soon as you possibly can; we expect you in good faith to pay this interest." Should it become necessary in the future as to certain of the debtor countries to formally grant an extension of time, that may be done by a resolution of the Congress of the United States; that is a question which can be met when the emergency arises and can be viewed in the light of facts then existing.

But let us see what the real great difference is. In my judgment, it is to be found in this fact: If this indebtedness shall be permitted to drift, if we allow it to remain a sort of open account, although the debtor nations have solemnly agreed, of course, to put it into a particular form, if they are not called on now to reaffirm that obligation and do it in proper and solemn form, they will be led to believe that the United States does not mean business; they will be led to believe that somehow or other they will ultimately escape payment. If the interest is not demanded from them from time to time in due and proper form the sentiment, already widely disseminated, to the effect that the United States ought not to collect this debt at all, will gain force from our inactivity and our failure properly to proceed.

So, Mr. President, I insist with all the strength I am capable of putting into it that now is the time to call for a settlement; now is the time to call for a reratification, if you please, or a reaffirmation of the obligation that has already been taken. That is particularly true with reference to those Governments which, in fact, did not exist at all at the time some of this money was loaned. Some of these Governments were mere juntas existing within foreign Governments and asserting to themselves the authority of government. Yet many hundreds of millions of dollars were paid to such governments or to those men who asserted that they constituted the government of nations which had not yet been organized, whose boundaries, in some instances, had not been fixed.

I repeat what I said the other day—that there is beyond any earthly question a great movement among the great financiers of this country to induce the United States to cancel the indebtedness of these foreign nations. This they seek to do for the selfish and almost treasonable purpose of thereby rendering the securities they hold the more valuable and the more readily collectible; for, of course, if the United States were to cancel the indebtedness of these foreign Governments, every private debtor of those Governments would be just that much nearer the day of settlement and payment upon the obligations he holds.

It is time for the Congress to quit trifling with this matter, and it is time for the Secretary of the Treasury to conform to the will of Congress. Months and months and months have elapsed since he first came forward with his proposition that the Government should give him the right to settle eleven thousand millions of dollars of indebtedness in such manner and form as he might see fit. A more insolent proposal never has been made to the American Congress.

There is another phase of this question that is not to be overlooked. The real party to this contract, the real creditor in this case, is not the American Government. The real creditor in this case is that vast body of American citizens who put their hands into their pockets and loaned money to this Government, to be in turn loaned to foreign Governments, and who loaned their money to this Government upon an express understanding had between them and the Government of the United States. That understanding was represented first by the law of Congress, which expressly provided that the money might be borrowed from our citizens upon the bonds of the United States and that the United States might loan it to foreign Governments, but that the United States Government should take from those foreign Governments bonds similar in terms, in interest, and in all respects to the bonds issued by the United States to our people. The contract, therefore, made between the Government of the United States and the people of the United States who furnished the money was that they should loan their money, not to the Government of the United States unsecured, to be given away, to be wasted, and with no signer upon the bonds except the Government of the United States. The contract was that the Government of the United States should take collateral for every dollar that it loaned. That collateral was to be the obligations of foreign Governments; and the legal effect of it was if the money was providently loaned and if the foreign Governments responded that there would be interest and principal repaid by the foreign Governments which would wipe out every dollar of the indebtedness to the American people, so that instead of taxing our people to death, instead of taxing these bondholders to death to gather in the money to pay the interest on the bonds we would obtain that interest and the return of that principal from our foreign debtors; and that was the solemn obligation, sir, which we took to the American people.

Suppose this were a contract between private individuals. Suppose that A agrees with B that B will loan him $100,000 with authority to loan it to C, upon condition that A take from C the obligation of C for the amount; and suppose that A should fail to carry out his contract, and fail to take the obligation of C. Is there any question but that in a court of law or a court of conscience A would be held to have breached his contract with the party furnishing the money? There can be no question about that. I say without the slightest hesitation that when these bonds were sold to the American people, when the American farmer was borrowing money at the bank to buy bonds, when the washwoman was taking the little savings that she had gathered from her labor at the tub to buy a bond, when the merchant was straining himself to the point of bankruptcy in order to buy bonds, when all our people with warm hearts and with open hands were engaged in despoiling themselves to buy these bonds, if at a time like that the American people had been told that this money was to be loaned to foreign Governments and no securities taken in return, the American people with all their patriotism probably would have refused to subscribe to these bonds, at least as liberally as they did.

We are the custodians of the people's business at the present hour, and it is our duty to transact that business as faithful servants and to see to it that every line that was written in these instruments, every line that was written in the law, shall be faithfully carried out. If it then transpires in the end that certain Governments are unable or unwilling to pay their obligations we will meet that question when it arises, but let us insist now upon a full and a final and an absolute settlement of this indebtedness.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice in the bill which is before the Senate that the commission is to be given this great power to adjust the interest and the maturity of the principal in such manner and for such periods "as shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America." I ask the Senator whether the hearings disclosed that this adjustment was necessary for the interests of the United States. I remember the address made by the chairman of the committee, the Senator from North Dakota, and he seemed to stress the idea that this was necessary to alleviate the condition of the debtors. I should like to know what the real motive was, as disclosed by the hearings. Was it in the interest of the United States or was it for the purpose of showing leniency to the debtors? There seems to be an inconsistency there.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is a little hard to answer that question categorically. There has been a propaganda going on in this country for five years which seems to have for its basic thought the idea that the United States is a Lady Bountiful for the whole world; that our resources are inexhaustible, our energies without limit, our power to pay and continue to pay without stint, and that the Congress of the United States, composed of men clothed with a little brief authority, have the right to give away the resources of this country whenever they see fit to pass a resolution to that effect—a proposition that seems to ignore the fact that the people who pay these moneys are not the Members of Congress, not the man who happens to be President, not the individual who chances to be Secretary of the Treasury, but that the people who pay these moneys are the taxpayers of the United States, and that in the last and final analysis every human being in the United States who is not a pauper is the payer of taxes. There seems to have been a theory that Congress has a right to give away the moneys collected from the people. I affirm that Congress has not now, and never had, the right to give away, without proper and just consideration, a single dollar of money wrung from the people in taxes; nor have we the power, as has been suggested by my friend from Utah [Mr. KING], to levy taxes except for strictly governmental purposes.

The whole atmosphere surrounding this and all similar transactions has seemed to be that if we can get money into the Treasury of the United States by hook or crook, then we have a right to do with that money whatever we please. That is an infamous doctrine. It is an utterly damnable doctrine. We have not that right. We have the power, but we have not the right, and if there were such a thing as a court having jurisdiction to control our acts, and keep us within the Constitution, a suit could be brought which would compel Congress to pursue the proper path marked by the Constitution.

Answering more specifically the question of the Senator, we voted this money originally, and expressly provided that it should be loaned to countries then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States. Yet over two thousand million dollars of this money was paid out after the last shot had been fired upon the Argonne front, after the battle flags had been furled, after our soldiers were crowding into transports to be returned to these shores, and after a state of actual peace existed, and after the President of the United States had declared in this Chamber, "Thus the war comes to an end." It was paid out in some instances, as I said a moment ago, to countries which did not even have boundaries yet established, whose Governments consisted in little juntas of men who had fled their native soil and set up pretended governments in other countries. All this was done in utter disregard of the plain letter of the statute.

The spirit of the thing was that Uncle Sam had boundless resources, and that it was our business to take care of all the rest of the world financially. Some good people thought we should take care of them politically for all time to come, a somewhat herculean job.

Coming more directly still to an answer to the question asked me by the Senator from Nebraska, the constant talk in the hearings was to the effect that we must help these other countries, we must assist these other countries, we must not be hard on these other countries. We were still acting as their aid and as their support. We were still talking about taking care of those countries. We were not proposing to treat them as the ordinary debtor is treated.

Mr. President, enough of that spirit has permeated my soul so that I recognize the fact that we ought, as far as we can, give them an opportunity to recover themselves; but we are giving them that opportunity to the fullest extent when we ask nothing more than that they recognize their obligations, that they agree to begin to pay the interest. Then, if the time comes when they can not pay the interest, let us settle that question at that time.

Mr. President, this Congress may not do its duty. It may brush aside its obligations. It may give this power to the Secretary of the Treasury, and he may exert it as he sees fit. I do not like to say it, but I fear it will be so exerted as to assist very materially private bondholders, private creditors of these countries.

I protest against it, and I have no hesitancy in saying that if there is any trifling with this question, if there is any failure on our part to do our duty, at the next election, which is coming very soon, the American people will express their opinion in no uncertain terms. That is not meant as a lecture; it is not meant as a threat. Standing here as one of the men charged with a high duty, that duty being chiefly to represent the sentiment of the people of my State, I say that there is no division of opinion among the people of the State, though there may be one or two bankers closely allied with the Morgan banks who take an opposite view.

So, Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. I shall vote for it, and do whatsoever lies within my power to further its adoption.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, on Saturday the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] requested that I put into the RECORD the data on which I based the argument that this country was morally bound, at least, to grant an extension of time for the payment of interest by the foreign countries of from two to three years. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has just given utterance to the declaration, in substance, that those countries are in default to-day in the matter of the payment of interest, and if they are in default to-day, it will not injure their credit any more if they issue their bonds, long-time obligations, and then default in the first six months' or year's interest.

I meet that with the assertion that no one of those countries considers itself in default to-day, nor do I consider them in default, in the payment of their interest. The Secretaries of the Treasury have agreed that they were not in default, and that we were morally bound to give them the extension of time.

The Senator from Missouri, and I think other Senators, have stated that we made a suggestion, and that that suggestion was never acted upon, that no moral obligation ensued as a result of that. I want to read into the RECORD now part of the testimony, the letters, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and I wish those who are interested in that one phase of the question, as to whether we have morally obligated ourselves to give them time in the payment of the interest, or whether we have not done so, would give attention to these quotations. Mr. President, the following excerpts are taken from pages 58 and 59 of the annual report of Secretary Houston on the state of the finances for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1920. This is what he said in that report:

In the early autumn of 1919 the Treasury informed the treasuries of the European Governments to which it had made advances that it was prepared, in case they so desired, to discuss with them the exchange of the demand notes for long-time obligations, and in that connection the deferring of interest collection during the reconstruction period of two or three years from the spring of 1919.

Of course, if we stopped right there there would be no obligation whatever; but let us see what followed. I shall read now an excerpt from the letter of Secretary Mellon to the late Senator Penrose, pages 179 and 180 of the hearings before the Committee on Finance. However, I think I had better read first the statement of Secretary Mellon concerning the replies of the other Governments, which will be found, as I have quoted it, on page 1856 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Saturday, January 28. I will read a little of the colloquy which occurred in the hearing between the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the Secretary. The Senator from Massachusetts was reading a part of a letter from Secretary Mellon, and the testimony was as follows:

Senator WALSH (reading): "In view of the public announcement on this subject made by Secretary GLASS, communicated as it was to the foreign Governments, reported to Congress by both Secretary GLASS and Secretary Houston, and acquiesced in for more than two years, I think good faith and fair dealing obligate this Government to the extent I have indicated."

I wish you would explain just to what extent Secretary GLASS and Secretary Houston have committed this country to the policy or the position of not collecting interest on overdue interest.

Secretary MELLON. The Treasury made this statement to the foreign Governments.

Senator WALSH. Who was Treasurer at the time of the statement?

Secretary MELLON. I believe Secretary GLASS was.

Senator WALSH. Who is it directed to, Mr. Secretary?

Secretary MELLON. To the British treasury. Mr. Chamberlain replied to it——

Senator WALSH. Have you the date, Mr. Mellon?

Secretary MELLON. Yes; December 2, 1919.

Senator WALSH. Now, give us the communication that you refer to.

Secretary MELLON (reading): "The Treasury is prepared, at the convenience of the Governments of the Allies, to take up with their representatives the funding of the demand obligations which the United States holds into long-time obligations and at the same time refunding during the reconstruction period of, say, for a year or two or three years of the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States under the Liberty loan acts."

That was stated to the foreign Governments.

Senator WALSH. Do you construe that language to bind our Government to a position of refusing to insist upon compound interest?

Secretary MELLON. I can not see how it could be otherwise. That was replied to by Mr. Chamberlain, of Great Britain. * * *

The chancellor replied as follows:

This is the crux of the whole matter. The quotation from the chancellor is as follows:

You are already aware that the British Government accepts, as far as they are concerned, the suggestions of the United States that the demand obligation of the Allies should be funded into long-time obligations and that for a period of two or three years—preferably three—the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States should also be funded, and that we are ready to extend similar treatment to our allies in respect of their obligations to us.

Secretary Mellon said in his letter to the late Senator Penrose:

1. In view of the action of my predecessors I am of the opinion that as to the principal foreign Governments receiving advances from the proceeds of Liberty bonds, this Government is committed to the postponement of the interest for two or three years (over two years of which have already elapsed) and to the spreading over subsequent years the payment of the postponed interest installments; but that this obligation is contingent upon such foreign Government carrying out with reasonable promptness, after this Government is ready to proceed, a satisfactory funding of its existing short-time obligations to this country. As to the compounding of interest, Secretary Houston, in his annual report to Congress for the year 1920, clearly shows that it was not contemplated that interest should be charged on the postponed interest, at least during the two or three year period. However, I regard that dates suggested by Secretary Houston in his annual report for the payment of this deferred interest as merely tentative and not a binding commitment.

In view of the public announcement on this subject made by Secretary Glass, communicated as it was to the foreign Governments, reported to Congress by both Secretary Glass and Secretary Houston, and acquiesced in for more than two years. I think good faith and fair dealing obligate this Government to the extent I have indicated.

I think we must agree with the Secretary that when the proposition was made by this Government to the foreign Governments and the foreign Governments said they would accept our proposition to defer the interest for two or three years and then fund the interest into long-time obligations, and when the report of that agreement was made to Congress and we acquiesced in it and the treasuries of the several countries acquiesced in it, there is a binding moral obligation that we hold to the suggestion we made and which was accepted by the foreign Governments. So I take the position that these foreign Governments have a right to say, "We have not defaulted because we have deferred the interest and will put that interest into long-time bonds in an agreement made with the United States."

That case is entirely different from one in which the Government issues its bonds and on the first interest-paying date defaults. Then the credit of the Government is at stake, because that is an obligation which the Government is expected to meet, and expected to meet promptly, or to acknowledge its bankruptcy. There is a vast difference between the two.

I desire to answer briefly one other matter referred to by the Senator from Missouri. He intimates that the real motive back of the proposition of extending the interest beyond six months or one year emanates from a desire to protect the American holders of foreign bonds. The Senator from Missouri said that there are $4,000,000,000 of such bonds and obligations held in the United States. I had that matter looked into immediately, and I ascertained that of the bonds of foreign countries in Europe floated in this country, the Governments which are affected by this agreement—Cuba, Great Britain, France, Belgium, Russia, and Italy—all together floated and have outstanding about $838,000,000 in bonds. If we take the municipalities and the corporations whose bonds have been floated in the United States, the grand total outstanding would only amount to $992,000,000. This was a report made as of June 30 last. Since that time British obligations have been paid off in the sum of $93,713,000, so that should be deducted from the $992,000,000, leaving in the neighborhood of $898,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Since that time France has floated about $25,000,000 of French bonds, which would have to be added. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I wish to inquire whence emanates the report to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. McCUMBER. From the Treasury Department, and it is also printed in the Federal Reserve Bulletin of August, 1921.

That is the amount when all are taken together. If we were to take all of the obligations of all foreign Governments and of all of the municipalities of foreign Governments which have floated bonds here and all of their industrials which have been floated in the United States, the records which I have obtained from the same source show that they would amount to about $2,000,000,000, altogether.

So, Mr. President, I think there is no thought whatever in the mind of anyone that it is going to help the holders of any of those bonds in this country. I do not know to what extent municipalities or industries which have issued bonds have kept up their payments. My information is, though I may be in error, that the Governments which have floated their bonds have kept up payments on their bonds, but of that I am not absolutely certain. When I say all, I speak of the principal Governments, like Great Britain, France, and Italy.

Really, the suggestion for taking collateral security emanated, I think, from the discussions which were had before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, when we were considering the question of prohibiting any commission or the Secretary from accepting any bonds other than those of the debtor country. However, we thought that it might be well, in the case of some of those countries, to get good collateral security if we could. In the second bill that provision was included.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made the statement a short time ago that we had shown no reason in the world why it would be for the interest of the United States to extend the time of payment, that all we had done was to extend leniency to the foreign Governments. When we are dealing with creditors who are bankrupt or nearly bankrupt, it very often inures to the interest of the creditor to be most lenient with them and to give them time in which to make their payments. So when we are dealing with countries which are on the verge of bankruptcy and some of whom can not possibly pay the interest on their obligations within six months or one year or even two years, I think it is for the interest of this Government to compose our matters with those foreign Governments in such way that we can have a definite sum fixed in an obligation and made payable at a time in which they can make the payment without being compelled to admit their bankruptcy within six months or within two years. It is for our benefit as well as the benefit of our debtors to so arrange.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, one of the disturbing factors, from my viewpoint at least, which seems to have developed in the debate is an apparent feeling of a lack of confidence in responsible public officials. The debate seems to be predicated to some extent on the assumption that officials holding most important responsibilities under the Government will not perform their full duty or will be false to a great trust. I very much regret that sentiment. Laying aside just what may be the prerogative of Congress so far as defining or limiting legislation is concerned, it appeals to me as being very unfortunate because, of course, in the final analysis, if we can not depend upon Cabinet officers—practically the President of the United States, who under the pending bill is given the authority to select the commission, one of whom shall be the Secretary of the Treasury—it seems to me we are in a rather serious situation.

The Senate would not be giving up any of its prerogatives in this matter if we delegate whatever additional authority to the President, and the Secretary of the Treasury and the commission to be appointed, may be considered necessary. As I understand it the additional authority provided in this bill over and beyond already existing authority is rather slight.

I followed the argument and agree absolutely with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that it is impossible from a practical business standpoint—and this is a practical business question, a matter of an indebtedness to this country of approximately $10,000,000,000—for the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States to write an act limiting the authority of those officers who must necessarily negotiate the debt; limiting them in such manner that it is impossible for them to act for the creditors, the taxpayers of the country, and secure for them the best possible arrangement.

It is an unfortunate situation, in my judgment, that we can not trust—and that is the only term I think we can use—the President of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate the best possible business arrangement with our debtors.

As has been very well said and thoroughly understood, I think, a majority of these countries are nearly or absolutely bankrupt. Their budgets do not balance to-day. Their issue of money, of course, it is understood, discounts the value of that money because of the financial conditions of the countries. They have some securities, however, collateral securities of various kinds and nature, that a commission acting for the United States could readily take over as a part of the security for bonds that might be taken by this country.

We can not legislate and serve the best interests of the country by attempting to define what the securities shall be or what particular consideration shall be given in the way of deferred interest in order to get possession of those securities. It seems to me it is absolutely parallel with the duty of every bank board of directors meeting once or twice a week in the banking institutions of the country. They have discounted paper or purchased commercial paper of various kinds. Some business enterprises are not successful, and the bank board recognizes the fact that the paper, with its indorsements and the securities back of it, is not sufficient to enable them to collect the full amount of the principal and interest which the paper represents. What is the bank going to do? Either through the executive committee or a subcommittee they probably have an interview with the man to whom they have loaned the money, as a result of which, after investigation, they come to the conclusion that the situation is such that they can not call payment of the paper at that moment, but that they probably can give a certain amount of time, and meanwhile they can take over some securities which the man may have in the shape of mortgages or something of that character, with the result that the bank ultimately does not lose the principal and the interest on the paper and also with the ever to be desired result that the borrower, being temporarily tided over, is perhaps ultimately able to regain his business stability and position.

I can not see where the present situation differs in the slightest degree from the illustration I have cited, excepting that the Government of the United States, representing the people of the United States, has as debtors 15 or 20 Governments abroad, with varying degrees of ability to pay, and that now we want to place their obligations in some businesslike form, to refund them, to add the accrued interest to the principal, where it is wise to do so, and to take over other securities where it is possible to obtain them; in other words, to negotiate a common sense business obligation between debtor and creditor.

So far as I have followed the debate this morning and heretofore, the only real objection I have heard stated to the proposed arrangement seems to be due to a feeling of suspicion or lack of confidence that our public servants, the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States, who will be responsible for the naming of the other members of the commission, can not be trusted to represent the people of this country in that great responsibility.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we are coming to a sorry period in our national life when the Congress can not delegate an authority which, while most important, still, as I look upon it, is purely of a departmental nature without feeling that our executive officers will not do their full duty or will be false to their great trust and to their oath. As a business proposition and as a national policy, it appeals to me very strongly that the Senate should adopt the report of the committee as presented, and should give latitude to our officials in order that they may negotiate the best possible terms with our debtors abroad. A hard and fast statute as to what we would or would not accept will only result in postponed action, and we will be just where we are to-day, with our obligations in a most unsatisfactory condition.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] makes a point of the fact that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Rathbone, representing the Treasury Department, indicated to the British Government, and through the British Government to the other allied Governments, that the postponement of the payment of interest for two or three years might be considered acceptable. Admitting that to be so, the Senator must see, from a reading of the correspondence which has been duly printed for the use of the Senate, that the very postponement of the beginning of the payment of interest to April of this year and to June of this year implied that when those dates had arrived the payment of interest should begin. It also implied that the Treasury of the United States took the position that it would make no concessions beyond the mere deferment of the payment of interest.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me correct the Senator, if he will allow me right there.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall have to decline to yield to the Senator, as he declined to yield to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. I was not aware that I declined to yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I was aware of it. The Senator declined to yield to me not only to-day but on several previous occasions.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply asked the Senator to wait until I had finished a sentence.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And I ask the Senator to wait until I finish.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will do so, but the Senator is mistaken when he says that I impliedly forgot to state that these declarations did not cover the subject.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I decline to yield for the same reason that the Senator from North Dakota declined to yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And yet the Senator from North Dakota brought into the Senate here a bill which proposed, first, to give to the Secretary of the Treasury, and later to the commission, the power not only to defer interest but the power to reduce the rate of interest without limit. He brought into the Senate a bill which not only did that, but also gave power to the commission or to the Secretary of the Treasury to substitute other bonds for the bonds of the Governments which had been accepted; he brought into the Senate a bill which not only would have empowered the Secretary of the Treasury to fix the date of maturity of the bonds as provided by law but to fix the date of maturity for the bonds at any future period, say 100 years, which would give to the Secretary of the Treasury power to defer the payment of interest for 10, 20, or 30 years. It is only after the most determined fight which has been made in this Chamber and before the committee that a number of amendments and limitations upon those powers have been forced upon the committee. First, the committee has been compelled to fix the utmost maturity of the bonds for the year 1947; second, the committee has been compelled to limit the power of the Secretary of the Treasury so that he may accept only the bonds of the country owing the debt to the United States; third, the committee has been compelled upon the floor of the Senate here to fix the rate of interest at not less than 4½ per cent. All of these gains have been made as the result of the opposition to this proposed legislation.

The record of the previous administration upon the subject of these obligations is plain. When it was proposed by the representatives of Great Britain in Paris that the United States should join Great Britain in a program by which the United States would relieve Great Britain of as much indebtedness as Great Britain would relieve the other countries of Europe of, the President of the United States himself, and later on the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Houston, stated definitely that they would not and could not under the law abate the obligation of Great Britain or of any other country in any respect; that each must be considered upon its own foundation and upon its own merits; and that the attitude of the American Government was to treat those obligations as valid obligations, payable principal and interest, in accordance with the laws of the United States under which they were issued.

That correspondence further shows that the representatives of the United States and of Great Britain had progressed to a point in November, 1919, where the terms and specifications of the bonds which Great Britain was to issue to the United States were almost agreed upon, and during all of that negotiation the letters, as published in various Senate documents, show that the attitude of the Wilson Government was firm that these obligations must be met in full and that the interest must be paid in full. The utmost that was conceded was that for such interest as was in default up to 1922 additional bonds might be accepted, such bonds to be paid over a course of a number of years on the installment plan in the future; but as for the payment of interest and as for the payment of the principal the Government of the United States under Woodrow Wilson yielded nothing more. That is the history of the case, and will be found as I have stated it in various Senate documents.

Mr. President, I am not in the position of saying that it may not become necessary for the responsible authority of the United States, representing the American people, to make some concessions to many of the foreign Government debtors and possibly to all of them. An examination may show that it would be to the interest of this country and of its commerce to make some concessions, but what I say is that it is not right for the Congress of the United States, representing the people of the United States as it does to abdicate its control over this matter; it is not right for Congress to place in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury or the President of the United States or the commission nominated by him the great power which was asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury when he came before the committee. He asked power to reduce the rate of interest to any figure which he might choose; he asked power to defer payment of the principal to any possible remote date that he might consider desirable; he asked power practically to make enormous grants, running to an unlimited amount, in the case of many of the debtor nations. I say not that it would be unwise, possibly, for the United States to make some concessions in the interest of the world and possibly in the interest of the commerce of the United States, but that it is monstrous in a Republic like ours to intrust to a few executive or administrative officers such enormous power as was involved in the request made by the Secretary of the Treasury. That is really the question before us now.

It is not a question as to whether we will abate some of the debt owed us by foreign countries and make concessions to our unfortunate debtors who have suffered so much; that is not the question; the question is whether Congress will hold the power to make that decision or will turn it over to a few men who are not chosen by the people to perform that function.

Mr. President, I agree with the idea that it may become necessary, and might become desirable, to negotiate some form of settlement with the debtor nations, but when that negotiation is made it should be brought to the Congress of the United States for approval, or at least to the Senate of the United States, if it be placed in treaty form. It is not right to repose in any body that great discretionary power which was proposed as this bill was originally introduced; and I should like to have the Senator explain here, if he can, why it was that he was willing to extend such vast power to the proposed commission or to the Secretary of the Treasury and was not in favor of imposing the limitations upon that power which he has been forced to accept in the form of amendments to the bill.

The pending amendment contemplates another limitation upon that power; the pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], which proposes that the interest shall be paid semiannually, just as the United States is compelled to pay semiannually the interest on the money it borrowed. I understand the chairman of the committee and the committee itself are resisting the demand to impose that limitation. They are resisting the demand to have the interest paid semiannually, although, if this amendment fails, no one can tell when the interest will be paid; it will be purely in the discretion of the commission as to when the interest shall be paid if this amendment is not engrafted upon the bill.

The argument which the Senator from North Dakota advances as a reason why this amendment should not be adopted and why these countries should not promise to pay their interest semiannually is that if they made an agreement with the commission they would have to begin paying the interest six months afterwards, and they might not be able to do so. In reply I aver that if they are not ready to begin paying interest within six months, the time has not arrived to give them a definite extension. The United States can not possibly be in any stronger position as the result of this legislation than it is now. At the present time it holds the demand obligations of these countries. As long as it continues to hold demand obligations, it has the power in its own hands; and it would be folly for it, holding this power, to give up that power and make a great extension of time to the countries when they are in no position to begin paying interest even six months after that time.

If they are not able to begin paying interest six months after the time, the thing for us to do is to hold the demand obligations until they are able. But we know that at least one of those countries is able to pay interest and is willing to pay interest if it is required, and that is the British Empire. We know that the proper authority of the British Government—I think it was the chancellor of the exchequer—stated in his speech in the House of Commons last fall that Great Britain was arranging to begin the payment of interest upon its indebtedness to the United States this spring, and we know that he stated to the House of Commons how he proposed to begin the payment of that interest.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. There is nothing to prevent Great Britain now from paying interest at any time that she wants to, is there?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, while Great Britain is able to begin paying interest, there would be no reason under this authority why a great extension of time might not be made to Great Britain; and if we do not incorporate in this bill the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina that interest shall be payable semiannually, this commission would have power to extend a great leniency to Great Britain on that account, and Great Britain might well say to the United States: "Why should you be harder on us than you are on some of these other debtor nations?" In my opinion, it is putting the commission in a weak position with the diplomats and the statesmen of Great Britain to give this power to them, and place them in a position where they will be under pressure from the representatives of Great Britain to accord to Great Britain the same leniency of treatment that may be accorded to France or some other country.

I say that this legislation is ill timed. It is not proper at this time because only one of the nations in Europe is ready to begin paying interest. It is not proper at this time because if it is enacted it will probably result in that nation deferring the payment of interest. It will be better for us to hold those demand obligations as we do now until the time arrives when, under pressure from the United States, the countries are able to look forward six months and say, "We can begin paying interest." When that time comes it will be time enough to empower a commission or anybody else to make an arrangement with them, and when that arrangement is made it ought to be brought to the Congress of the United States for ratification.

A commission with full power to make a contract without any power above it for ratification will, of course, be comparatively powerless to protect the interests of the United States. If the nations of Europe who owe us this money know that any contract made with this commission must be submitted to the United States Congress or the Senate for ratification, they are not likely to seek a contract that would not meet the test of public opinion in the United States.

I say, therefore, that this legislation is ill-timed. It had better be deferred. If it is deferred, Great Britain will begin in April the payment of her interest to the United States, and the other countries will begin much more quickly than they will under this legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I thought it appropriate while the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] was making his statement, and making it upon an assumption that was not at all supported by the record, to call his attention to his error at the time. The Senator declined to yield for that purpose. For the purpose of making the record clear, I desire now to read parts of two paragraphs of the correspondence between the United States and Great Britain.

The Senator from Nebraska asked, If this Government made the proposal that it would extend the interest for one or two or three years, and the other Government responded that it would accept that proposition, would not that imply that the interest then should be paid at the end of two years or three years, whichever the case might be? Of course, if that had been the suggestion and the acceptance of the suggestion, that would be true; but, as a matter of fact, the suggestion contained the proposition that the interest should be funded, and the acceptance contained the statement that they would accept the proposition that the interest should be funded into a long-time obligation, and that the Allies would grant like leniency to their creditors.

This was the proposition:

> The Treasury is prepared, at the convenience of the Governments of the Allies, to take up with their representatives the funding of the demand obligations which the United States holds into long-time obligations and at the same time refunding during the reconstruction period of, say, for a year or two or three years of the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States under the Liberty loan acts.

And the reply of Mr. Chamberlain was:

> You are already aware that the British Government accepts, as far as they are concerned, the suggestions of the United States that the demand obligations of the Allies should be funded into long-time obligations and that for a period of two or three years—preferably three—the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States should also be funded, and that we are ready to extend similar treatment to our allies in respect of their obligations to us.

That answers completely the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska that if we made the proposition to them to extend the time for two or three years, and they accepted it, that impliedly bound them to pay the interest at the end of the two or three years. The agreement, so far as it ripened into an understanding at all, was of an entirely different character, and implied that the interest, as well as the principal, should be funded into long-time bonds.

Mr. BORAH obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me for a moment in order that I may ask the Senator from North Dakota a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Who is to pay these commissioners, and how are they to be paid—from what funds, and how much?

Mr. McCUMBER. We would have to depend upon an appropriation to take care of their expenses, of course.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is no provision in the present bill for that.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Secretary, of course, already has his salary, and he would have to have nothing more except any necessary expenses that the department incurred. If anything at all is allowed to the other commissioners, of course, we would have to appropriate for it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I was a Member of Congress when these loans were made to the foreign Governments.

Under this legislation about $11,000,000,000 has been loaned and is now due. As I was a Member of this body which was responsible for the loaning, I feel that the least I can do is to do everything I can to see that it gets back, and I do not believe that it is a fulfillment of my obligation to impose upon some one else the obligation of seeing that it gets back and thereby say that I have performed my duty.

It is not a vote of lack of confidence in the Secretary of the Treasury or a vote of lack of confidence in the President of the United States or the administration. Those things are said for the purpose of agitating some one who is uneasy about his regularity in party affairs. They do not disturb me one way or another. I am far more concerned about the merits or demerits of the measure than I am about regularity. I think a Senator can do nothing less than vote for those measures which he believes will be most effective in returning to the Treasury of the United States, and indirectly to the taxpayers, that which he was responsible for having paid out.

Unless the two amendments proposed are adopted I shall not be able to vote for this measure, and for that reason I want to state briefly my views in regard to them.

Of course the nonpayment of interest is, in effect, a new loan. If we fail to impose upon the commission the obligation of collecting the interest annually or semiannually, and if the commission, taking the hint from the legislation, sees fit to postpone the payment of that interest, it is in effect nothing more than a new loan to that extent to the foreign Government. After all has been said, and the discussion is over, and the analysis is complete, that is the basis of this contention for nonpayment of interest. It is securing a new loan without an express authority for granting it.

Secondly, Mr. President, it ought to be remembered that the failure to collect interest is, in effect, imposing that amount of additional taxes upon the people of the United States. Just in proportion as we either forgive or postpone the payment of the principal or the interest, the taxpayers of this country must ultimately come in and make good.

I do not know what the proposed commission will do, but we are proposing by our legislation to say that we grant an additional loan to the foreign Governments, thereby imposing upon our people an additional burden in the way of taxes. Stripped of all verbiage, that is precisely the result of the failure to adopt these amendments.

There can be no object in leaving these amendments out of the bill if it is the intention of the Secretary of the Treasury and the commission to collect this interest. The reason why it is desired that it be left out of the bill is because they want the latitude which will enable them to postpone it; otherwise they would be very glad to have it in there, as authority. In other words, Mr. President, if it should be discovered, after attempted negotiations, that some particular nation could not pay its interest, there would be very little difficulty in the Secretary of the Treasury reporting back to the Congress in regard to that particular nation; but they turn the thing about, and advertise to the entire group of debtors that the Congress of the United States has practically invited them to ask for an extension of the time in which to pay the interest.

It reminds one of the story which is told in the biography of Gen. Grant, who, when a boy, was sent to a neighbor by his father to purchase a horse, with the instruction that he should pay the neighbor $50 for the horse, but if he would not take $50, he should pay him $75. So, when young Grant arrived, he informed the neighbor that his father had authorized him to pay him $50, and if he would not take that, he was prepared to pay $75. Then he said, "Now, what is the price of your horse?" Of course, it was $75. Mr. President, we are saying to each and every one of the debtor nations that if they feel disposed to ask for the nonpayment of interest, the lawmaking body of the Government of the United States has acquiesced already in that proposition.

In view of what has happened in the last three years, does anyone suppose that any of these nations will not feel that it can make better use of the interest than we can?

They have their obligations at home to meet, and they have their expenses, and they are also engaged in some enterprises in the way of extending their commercial affairs, so that they will, no doubt, feel that they are really not in a position to pay the interest now, because they have a better use to which to put their money. As a result, I doubt very much whether any of this interest will be paid for the next 5 or 10 years, which will result, as I said, in loaning a very large sum of money to those people.

The underlying fact in regard to this indebtedness is the powerful influence which is against collecting it at all, either principal or interest. I do not know that the administration entertains for a moment the idea that it will never be paid. I do not know how many Senators think that it will never be paid. We are discussing the matter here as seriously as if we expected it to be paid; but I do submit that the most powerful financial interests in the world, both in this country and abroad, intend that it shall never be paid, and the effect of the influence of those interests upon the Congress of the United States will be demonstrated in the future as in the past. I am not willing in any event to connive at the program of cancellation by postponing interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that if it is not paid it will be because we do not insist upon it in the right way?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think that is true. I think they can pay it. I think if we insist upon it they will pay it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Idaho will be interested to know that the Secretary of the Treasury announced to the Committee on Finance that in his opinion 80 per cent of this debt was collectible.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think it is collectible, but how much of it will be collected, I do not know. There is little evidence at hand now that any part of it will be collected. The only thing which will prevent cancellation is a continued sustained public demand upon the part of the people.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not think it is collectible immediately. I do not think it can be paid in gold within many, many years. I think if we pursue a wise and proper policy, a commercial policy, and do not impose prohibitive tariffs, in the exchange of commodities and the benefits derived therefrom, in the advantages which may be received, the debt in time will be paid; but it will be a long time, perhaps 25 or 30 or 40 years, before it can be paid. But it can not be paid in gold, and we might just as well disillusion ourselves if we are laboring under the impression that we are going to get the debt paid in gold and get it quickly.

Mr. BORAH. I realize that this debt can not all be collected at once, and I realize that the payment of the principal must necessarily be spread over a number of years; but the best way to notify a debtor every six months that he owes a debt is to collect interest on the debt. If he pays the interest regularly, he is not likely to get it into his mind that he does not owe the debt and never intends to pay the debt. I think that if we impose upon the debtor the obligation of paying the interest upon the debt annually, it will be a notification that the American people expect the payment of this money when it can be paid and under proper circumstances and conditions.

Mr. President, I was going to say that in a conversation a few days ago with a gentleman perhaps well known to all Members of the Senate, a man of national reputation, whose name possibly I am not privileged to use in public discussion, a man who has just returned from a four months' stay in Europe, he said the only place he knows of where the payment of this debt is still discussed is in the United States; that in the chancelleries of Europe, among the bankers of Europe, among the business men of Europe, among the economists of Europe, it is considered that the debt will never be paid, and that it is simply a question of postponing the settlement until, as they say, the public mind of America will accede to the wisdom of canceling the debts.

I read an article in the London Times a few days ago, which I can almost quote from memory, in which it was said that it is too soon to expect the American people to consent to the cancellation of these debts, but that that must ultimately be the course which is to be pursued. I have taken some trouble to ascertain the public view in England, and, Mr. President, I know of but one publication that contends that this debt ought to be paid or ever will be paid.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think perhaps in fairness to some of those publications and to the public mind of Great Britain it might be said that Great Britain has signified a perfect willingness not to collect debts due her in the event the United States did not push the collection of obligations due us, so that Great Britain would perhaps gain nothing by the transaction. If we should forgive her the debt, and she should forgive all those who were indebted to her, I think she would come out about even.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he recalls the reply the United States made to that suggestion from Great Britain?

Mr. BORAH. I recall it. I do not pay particular attention to what is said by these diplomats with reference to paying this debt. They are not free, of course, to stand up and say, "We do not propose to pay." Whatever they think, they are not in a position to say it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the reply was that, as far as the obligation which Great Britain owed the United States was concerned, it was good, and was collectible.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I remember that.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But as far as the debts which many of the European countries owed to Great Britain were concerned, they were of no value, so that she would be giving up something of little value, and we would be giving up something worth a hundred cents on the dollar. That was the reply of the United States. That was the attitude of the United States.

Mr. KING. I do not think that reply was quite accurate, because the obligations to Great Britain are largely due from France and from Italy, and both the obligations of France and of Italy are good, in my opinion.

Mr. KING and Mr. McCORMICK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield first to the Senator from Utah; then I will yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. KING. I am advised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that I understated the matter—that the obligations due to Great Britain are $8,000,000,000. Great Britain, therefore, if I understand her position, is willing to cancel the eight billion if we will cancel what is due from Great Britain to us.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the debt owing Great Britain from other nations stands upon an entirely different footing from the debt owed by other nations to this Nation. Great Britain understood at the time those debts were created that it was in the nature of a subsidy to those Governments. They were not in a position at that time to perform their part in carrying on the war, and therefore Great Britain extended these loans in the nature of a subsidy. Now I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. I was about to ask the Senator from Utah if he rated the considerable Russian debt to Great Britain as good. The Senator will remember that it is very large.

Mr. BORAH. I will answer that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Idaho says that he will answer it; but let me say I think the debts which Russia owes will be paid in time. I think they are good. I have that confidence in the integrity of the Russian people which makes me believe that in time Russia will pay every dollar which the Russian people owe to other nations.

Mr. BORAH. I would a good deal rather have Russian obligations than the obligations of some of the some other nations which we have.

Mr. KING. So would I.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the Senator spoke of diplomats. I would like to submit the definition of a diplomat which I heard a few days ago for the Senator's consideration.

Mr. BORAH. I hope it is entirely commendatory.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A diplomat is a man who appropriates your coat in so engaging a manner that you thank him for taking it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Outlook, an English publication, states this matter just about as the English people understand it. It says:

> We have been assured in responsible American quarters that cancellation is impossible at present for political reasons; that all the latent anti-British and anti-European prejudices in the United States would flare up were such a project brought forward in Congress.
>
> * * * * * * *
> We are sorry, but clearly Europe must take America at her word when these things are said, and we in Europe must pin our hope to a process of education of the American masses and demand that our statesmen lose no opportunity—

That suggestion was wholly unnecessary—

> of enunciating the basic economic truths which weigh down upon us, hoping that America will see the light before irreparable disaster fastens upon us and a little later upon her.

I can see, for instance, why the Outlook would prefer a demand note to be changed into a 25-year bond, and also would prefer to have the interest payments deferred for 10 years, in order to give the English statesmen an opportunity to educate the masses of America to the belief that the entire debt ought to be canceled. As I said a moment ago, whether the Senators in this body who are opposing the amendments understand it or not, I venture to say that the controlling, moving, impelling power behind these two amendments is the fact that it is desired that an opportunity be given to educate the American masses to the cancellation of the entire debt, interest included. This article continues:

> The administration, we understand, has been quietly informing European Governments that a much better "atmosphere" for such a discussion will exist after official results have been reached concerning Pacific and armament problems.

Mr. President, I do not suppose the administration has given them any such information directly, but there is no doubt at all but that the opinion is entertained throughout the foreign countries that we ultimately will come to see the wisdom, from an economic standpoint, as well as from the standpoint of the equitable distribution of the war obligations, as they say, of the cancellation of this entire debt.

If that is the program, it is quite natural that they should say, "Let us not only postpone the payment of the principal for 25 years but let us postpone the interest just as long as we can." Nobody wants to pay interest on a debt that he does not expect ultimately to pay.

Again says another journal:

World trade can not revive—and if it does not we must starve—until interrelated international debts that weigh down all countries are wiped out, for only then can the exchanges be quieted down. The foundation upon which the pyramid of paper rests is the German indemnity. Once it is recognized that Germany can not pay the Allies, we in this country will be ready to agree that France and Italy can not pay us what they owe, and America will have to realize (but when?) that she can not collect the 10 milliards of dollars owed her by Europe.

I might spend the afternoon reading articles of that nature. I only read a sufficient number to indicate, as I have said, that the feeling is that the debt ought not to be paid at all.

Mr. President, I take the position that there is not a nation of Europe but could, in the interest of its own people, so adjust its budget as to be able to pay the interest upon its debt. All one need do is to run over their budgets and inform himself as to the amount of money which they are expending for those things which make not for peace and contentment and for the betterment of mankind but for their injury, and that by cutting it down even a small per cent they could meet the interest upon this debt.

So long as we continue to postpone the principal and continue to postpone the interest, my fellow Senators, do you realize that we are imposing upon the American people the burden of carrying European armament?

So long as you say to them, "In the dim distant future alone will you be called upon to meet the principal, and not until in future years will you be called upon to meet the interest," you are indirectly or impliedly encouraging them in proceeding to spend their money as they are expending it to-day. It would be a healthy thing for the people of Europe, it would be to the betterment of economic conditions throughout the world, if some pressure were put upon those people which would cause them to reflect as to the manner in which they are spending their money.

Mr. President, we are not without some difficulty in our own country. Of course, we have heard for the last few years so much about the great wealth of this Nation that when we are speaking with reference to our relationship to Europe we fail to comprehend that we have some difficulties of our own. I wish to ask Senators here present, when you go out this fall to see your constituents and to talk with them about the practical side of this proposition, and when you meet the farmer who is losing his farm because of his debts, and when you meet the business man who is discouraged and demoralized because of his taxes, and you say to him that it was not within the power of Congress to forgive his indebtedness or postpone his taxes or his obligations, what will he be likely to say to you when you have voted to postpone the indebtedness and the taxes of nations which are spending millions and millions for armaments?

He will say to you that you might at least have voted to require your agents to demand the payment of this interest and not forgive it in advance. When you meet your constituent and he says to you, "My children are out of school because I have not the means to clothe them and to feed them," and you will find constituents in some of the congested centers where they will say to you, "My children are hungry, but you did not postpone the exactions of this Government so far as we are concerned," what will your answer be?

It is up to us, it seems to me, and this is the very least that we can do, to say to our commission, which is the agent of this body which loaned the money, "Make a demand upon these people for interest. Let them present the facts, and when the facts are presented to you return them to this body and we will pass upon the question." I am not in favor of some other agent taking the responsibility that rests upon me. I am willing to assume it for myself.

Mr. President, I would be perfectly willing to forego the Simmons amendment if, in lieu of it or as a result of the final contest, the amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] were adopted. If the final settlement is brought back to this body, with the facts which will be presented to the commission, for the action of this body, so that it may pass upon the question of whether or not a certain settlement shall be made, I would be perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to be content with that. But the proposition is not only to refuse to put into the bill a proposal for the collection of interest, but to take it completely out of the hands of the loaning department of the Government and report not at all to that body for its confirmation, but to settle it entirely through the agency which we have created.

It may be that the agency is far more competent, and I do not doubt that it is, to take up the question of negotiations; but I deny the proposition that five men, I do not care who they are, are wiser in their judgment and counsels as to final settlement than the entire body selected by the people of the United States to protect the Treasury and the taxpayers of the United States. If that were true, it were better that we abolish the lawmaking department entirely and create a commission, as they have in some cities, to transact the business of the people. Certainly we who loan the money and are responsible for it ought to be willing to take the responsibility for exercising our judgment as to how that money shall be returned.

Therefore, unless an amendment is included in the bill providing for a return to this body of the commission in case satisfactory settlement can not be had, I shall vote against the bill upon its final passage.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat I should like to ask for some information.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. KING. I was compelled by reason of illness to be away from the Senate practically all of last week. I am advised that during the consideration of the bill the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] argued, and ably argued as he always does, a legal proposition, namely, that it is not a legislative function to settle these obligations because it involves entering into a contract between the United States and other nations; that it was an Executive function and that the Executive had the authority and it was his duty to make a treaty respecting his obligation and then to submit the treaty to the Senate for ratification.

If the Senator cares to express it, I should be very glad to have his opinion, because if that is the view which should prevail, if that view is correct, then obviously the legislation which we now have before us is not needed.

Mr. BORAH. I was very much impressed with the argument made by the Senator from Montana. I have no doubt at all that that is one method by which this debt could be settled. I have no doubt that the President has the power to negotiate a contract of settlement and send it here for confirmation the same as he would send here a treaty for ratification.

The only question upon which I have not been able to satisfy myself and upon which I offer no opinion at this time, is whether or not that is exclusive. I am not clear that it is the exclusive method of settling the question. I know that Mr. Hamilton, in the Federalist, seems to argue that whatever comes within the treaty-making power is exclusive and must be carried on and consummated under that power. However, I am frank to state that I have not made up my mind whether it is exclusive or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, last week I presented the amendment which has just been alluded to, an amendment designed to retain in the Congress the power of ultimate determination of any settlement which might be made. I have heard three arguments advanced in opposition to the amendment. In respect to those arguments I desire to say just a word in response.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] opposed the amendment while indorsing its principle because, he said, it indicated a lack of confidence in the President or in the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], as I recall his argument, opposed the amendment because he did not think it was a good business way to deal with the transaction. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] had two other reasons to which I shall advert presently.

The arguments of the Senator from Indiana and of the Senator from Washington, the one that it was a vote of a lack of confidence, the other that it was not a good business proposition, are the sort of arguments the beginning of which is the end. Of course, to the statement, dogmatic in character, that this may be in derogation of the dignity of the administration, there can be no response except a negative. If it be a vote of lack of confidence in the administration for the Congress of the United States either to continue its duties or to reserve a part of its power, what is it when Congress supinely abandons its duty and abdicates its power? So, Mr. President, I do not think we need deal at all with the response that this is a vote of lack of confidence in anybody. There is no such purpose in the amendment and it can have no such effect. To defeat it is a vote of lack of confidence in ourselves, and after all we are the people with whom we are going to live the rest of our lives.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said, in answer to this amendment, that it is not essential or necessary nor should it be adopted because after all there is little discretion under the bill for the commission to perform.

Little discretion there may be; at any rate, there is discretion, and, to my mind, a very important discretion under this bill intrusted to the commission. If the Senator from Wisconsin is correct in saying that this amendment embodies a correct and accurate principle, then, if under the bill there is any discretion lodged in the commission, the principle should be followed and we should adopt the amendment.

He states as his second objection to the amendment that the Senate, with its peculiar rules and with a half dozen Members arguing daily might indefinitely postpone final action when the settlement was presented to it for ultimate and final determination. We have waited three years, Mr. President, for the settlement of the interest. It would not do us any harm to wait for three months, for the people of the United States to act upon what may be done under this bill in secrecy in the days to come. That there would be any considerable delay I do not for an instant concede, but assume that there would be the delay of a week or a month or two months or three months, what of it? We have already delayed three years the settlement of the interest due upon these obligations, and a further delay of one, two, or three months, so that the people of the country might know what was being done, would be a delay in the interest of the people of the country rather than in the interest of some gentlemen who may be interested in foreign bonds or in international banking.

Therefore, Mr. President, I suggest that the objections which have been urged are untenable. The amendment, I assume, of course, will be defeated, for I assume that we have got into the habit of abdicating our functions and abdicating them as to $10,000,000,000 will be a mere bagatelle. However, I wish it presented, and I desire to have a yea and nay vote upon the question whether or not it shall be adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to point out some objections to the pending measure. It seems to me there are two very substantial objections to it.

First of all there is absolutely no need whatever of this proposed legislation. There is now ample law upon the statute books to provide sufficient authority for the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund the debt which is due us. That is a proposition which is not seriously disputed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I gladly yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator from Massachusetts now referring to the principal of the debt, or the principal and interest, or to both?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am referring to both principal and interest.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator also referring to indebtedness which is due the United States for which we have no bonds or I O U's or any other form of obligation?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am referring to the major debt which is owed to us by foreign countries and for which we have their certificates of indebtedness.

Mr. KING. May I suggest to the Senator that it has been stoutly denied, as I understand the position of the Senator having this bill in charge, that the present law authorizes the funding of the deferred interest due the United States? He admits that the present law perhaps authorizes the refunding of the principal, but contends there is nothing in the law which will permit taking the interest, treating it as a separate account, and refunding it. I should like to ask the opinion of the Senator from Massachusetts as to that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am referring to the debts which are collectible and which are due this country from foreign countries. The other debts, to which the Senator refers, nearly everybody agrees are not collectible; they can not be collected. The former Secretary of the Treasury, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], made it very clear that that was his judgment in a speech made a few days ago; but so far as the great bulk of the debt, the major portion of the money due us from foreign Governments, is concerned, the present law gives, in my opinion, the Secretary of the Treasury ample authority to collect the principal and the interest and to refund it. I am also of the opinion that there is ample authority to refund the accrued interest which has not been paid.

Secondly, this is not the time to refund this debt. The worst time to refund a debt is when the debtor is facing bankruptcy. The chances are then all against making a good trade. The condition of the countries of Europe is worse this very year than it has been at any other time. To attempt to refund this debt now is to seize an opportunity for negotiating that is most favorable to those who owe us the money and least favorable to our own country. There can be no convincing answer to that proposition. The time to refund this debt will be when there has been a change from the present period of depression to an era of prosperity throughout the world. The Congress could not render a better service to the people of our country or afford a better chance to collect this debt in acceptable and favorable terms than to let the present notes or securities remain as they are until the conditions of business and of finance throughout the world change. That is the time, not now, to make to our debtors a proposition for refunding the debt. Let those who can pay their interest as it becomes due and let us wait till more propitious times for making new contracts with all of them.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. SPENCER. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to advocate that the matter be left just as it is without any action whatever, at least, for the present?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; I advocate that. It is unnecessary to enact any more legislation; there is enough legislation with reference to the matter now on the statute books.

Further, even the power given under the present law, the present, I contend, is not the time to urge refunding. It ought to be left until a later period.

Mr. SPENCER. Has the Senator from Massachusetts any idea as to how many weeks or months or years the form of this debt ought to remain unchanged?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have no idea. I might say to the Senator, however, that we have now waited for three years to collect some of the interest due on these debts because of the financial condition of these foreign countries; and yet, at a time when we know that their condition is worse than it has been at any time during the last three years, we are now proceeding to make new contracts to refund these debts.

Mr. SPENCER. Would the inference be a fair one, then, that in the opinion of the Senator probably the proper time to refund the debt would not occur for at least more than three years in the future?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not agree to any such proposition. We have our evidences of these debts, and all that is here proposed is that we take new evidences of these debts. We now have the notes of the debtor nations, but can not collect upon them, and all that can be done under the proposed refunding operation is to substitute one form of security for another; that is all that is meant by "refunding." We are not going to proceed to collect this debt; but it is merely proposed that we destroy the present certificates and notes which we hold and substitute some other form of indebtedness. That is all that this bill provides for. I say the time to substitute one security for another is not when the debtor is bankrupt, or is facing bankruptcy, but when he has overcome his financial distress and is beginning to enter upon an era of prosperity.

Mr. SPENCER. I wish to ask the Senator another question. Is not the Senator mistaken in making the statement that we already have the evidences of the debt? There is a part of this settlement which has to do entirely with the sale or transfer of property.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is true as to a very small part of the indebtedness. I am talking about the billions of major indebtedness and not about the few millions of other indebtedness. We are talking about the great bulk of the debt; and the only part that will ever be collected is now represented by the indentures of our debtor nations in the vaults of the United States Treasury.

Mr. SPENCER. A part of which is not in securities, as I presume the Senator will admit.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. A very small part of it—yes, that is true—but I am talking about the part which is collectible and which constitutes the great bulk of the debt.

Mr. SPENCER. Is it not the Senator's understanding also that some of the foreign debtor nations, at least Great Britain, France, and Italy, if this debt were refunded and interest-bearing securities substituted for those now held, would speedily begin to pay interest upon their refunded obligations, whereas now there is no interest being collected or paid?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. All I can say to the Senator in answer to his inquiry is that I think the foreign Governments will be in a most pitiable and deplorable plight if they give us bonds, the interest on which is payable semiannually, and then do not meet their payments. If they are unable to meet the interest obligations due on their notes which do not specifically designate the time for paying interest, what will their position be when they give us bonds in which the day and the hour for paying interest is determined? We know that many of the debtor nations can not pay the interest every six months on the bonds which they may substitute for their notes which we now hold.

Mr. SPENCER. But some of them can.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Exactly; but why do not those Governments which are now in a position to do so pay the interest which they owe us?

Mr. SPENCER. That is the very object of the commission we are proposing to create. We are not now in possession of any notes requiring interest within a limited time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the Senator argue seriously that the Secretary of the Treasury can not now accept from every one of the debtor countries the interest due to the United States?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not believe there is any provision giving the Secretary of the Treasury the power to arrange for the payment of interest.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Have we enacted a law which gives to the Secretary of the Treasury authority to postpone, to delay, to refuse to collect, or hesitate to demand the interest on our people's money that the Government loaned to these foreign countries?

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator from Massachusetts may be right about that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course, we have not.

Mr. SPENCER. The truth of the matter is that the last administration said that there would be no interest collected for a certain time, and the present administration has taken precisely the same position. Whether or not they had any legal authority to say that I am not now questioning, but that was the word that was given to the foreign countries, and morally, I think, we are bound by it. That is the reason no interest has been collected for the past two or three years.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I prefer to take the word of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who was the Secretary of the Treasury at the time that word was given, than to accept any suggestion made by any other Member of this body as to that proposition. As the Senator from Missouri knows, the Senator from Virginia very seriously questions whether any such consent was given or agreement was entered into with these foreign countries.

Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I should like——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Just a moment; the Senate will be in order. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Missouri to ask another question.

Mr. SPENCER. I should agree with the Senator from Massachusetts in taking anything that the Senator from Virginia may say at its face value, but I do not understand that the Senator from Virginia ever said anything to the effect that Mr. Houston when he was Secretary of the Treasury had not let it be understood that there would be for a certain period of time no enforcement of the payment of interest on the debts due to this country from foreign nations. Whether or not the extension was for a definite expressed number of years I do not know, but, as I understand, it was made known that for a time the payment of interest would be waived, and the present administration took precisely the same view. That is the reason interest has been waived.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understood the former Secretary of the Treasury, the present Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to say that when our Government undertook, through its representatives, to refund these debts the proceedings and negotiations were broken up for some reason of which he had no knowledge.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call the attention of the Senator to the correspondence which occurred about the 1st of December, 1919, between Mr. Rathbone, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, who was in Europe, and Mr. Blackett, representing the British treasury. In that correspondence Mr. Rathbone furnished a memorandum to the British treasury, indicating that it would be acceptable to the Treasury of the United States, that the payment of interest should be postponed for three years. In the same memorandum he provided a schedule of the payment of the principal in accordance with the law of the United States already in existence and for the payment of the accrued interest, covering three years, over a period of years on the installment plan.

The reply of the British treasury to the correspondence was that such an arrangement would be satisfactory to the British treasury, except that they did not feel that they would be justified in providing also in the same bonds for an amortization of any part of the principal. They were perfectly willing to have the principal mature in 1947, to pay interest during that whole period, and to pay on the installment plan the three years' interest already accrued; and the only thing they criticized and preferred not to accept was the amortization of the principal.

That contract is practically made, and Great Britain has already prepared to begin the payment of interest this spring. The British chancellor of the exchequer has made the statement in the British House of Commons that Great Britain would be prepared to begin this spring the payment of interest, and yet it is proposed by the passage of this legislation to empower this commission to postpone the payment of interest indefinitely. Why do that when the greatest debtor we have is ready to begin the payment of interest and has made preparations to begin the payment of interest this spring?

Mr. SPENCER. May I, out of the courtesy of the Senator from Massachusetts, read this sentence which clarifies what I had in mind?

I may say, in the first place, that I do not understand that this commission is compelled to accept any bonds that are due 25 years from their date. The commission may take bonds due in three years or in five years or at any other time. The prohibition is only as to the maximum length of time for which the bonds shall run.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand; but let the Senator glance at this situation: In 1919 the United States was insisting to Great Britain that she begin the payment of interest at a definite date, and that date was specified. Suppose Congress empowers a commission or the Secretary of the Treasury indefinitely to postpone the payment of interest; that supersedes the former arrangement——

Mr. SPENCER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And undoubtedly Great Britain will not begin the payment of interest this spring. There is no reason why we should treat Great Britain in any harsher manner than the other debtors, and Great Britain would object to having a harsher rule applied to her; but Great Britain would be very glad to embrace the changed attitude of Congress.

The attitude of this Government has been with Great Britain heretofore, under the former administration, that she should begin the payment of interest on that indebtedness, and the correspondence shows that repeatedly the representatives of our Treasury Department invited Great Britain to name a date at which the payment of interest would be begun; and yet it is proposed here now in Congress to empower a commission to postpone that date indefinitely, because that postponement applies to Great Britain just as much as it applies to any other country.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the Secretary of the Treasury has felt that there was a moral obligation upon our Government not to press payment for the past three years.

Mr. SPENCER. It was a little stronger than that, because what I had in mind——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please speak one at a time.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But I am talking, the Senator will bear in mind, about the condition of these countries, about their finances, and whether or not this is an opportune time to refund a debt, when these countries are in desperate financial straits.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator made that perfectly clear; but I gathered from what the Senator said in our cross-talking that the Senator believed that neither the Treasury under the former administration nor the Treasury under the present administration had made anything that could be fairly called a real obligation upon the part of this country to defer the payment of interest for any definite number of years.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have heard that discussed in the Finance Committee and also by the former Secretary of the Treasury [Mr. GLASS], and most of those who have considered this aspect of the question take the position that there was no agreement made; but the present Secretary of the Treasury—and that is enough for me; I will accept that—says that he feels morally bound by the messages that were sent back and forth from this country to Great Britain to live up to what he thought was a waiver of the collection of interest for three years.

Mr. SPENCER. Let me read to the Senator this single sentence and see if the Senator does not agree that there was a definite and positive moral obligation to waive that interest. I think the question was asked by the Senator from Massachusetts himself of Secretary Mellon:

I wish you would explain just to what extent Secretary GLASS and Secretary Houston have committed this country to the policy or the position of not collecting interest on overdue interest.

Secretary Mellon replied:

The Treasury made this statement to the foreign Governments:
Senator WALSH. Who was Treasurer at the time of the statement?

I presume the Senator meant, "Who was Secretary of the Treasury." The answer is, from Secretary Mellon:

I believe Secretary GLASS was.
Senator WALSH. Who is it directed to, Mr. Secretary?
Secretary MELLON. To the British Treasury. Mr. Chamberlain replied to it——
Senator WALSH. Have you the date, Mr. Mellon?
Secretary MELLON. Yes; December 2, 1919.

That, of course, was the former administration. Now, here is the sentence:

Senator WALSH. Now, give us the communication that you refer to.

This is the communication that was given to Great Britain in 1919 under the administration of President Wilson. The Treasury of the United States said to Great Britain at that time:

The Treasury is prepared, at the convenience of the Governments of the Allies, to take up with their representatives the funding of the demand obligations which the United States holds into long-time obligations and at the same time refunding during the reconstruction period of, say, for a year or two or three years of the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States under the Liberty loan acts.

That was stated to the foreign governments.

Senator WALSH. Do you construe that language to bind our Government to a position of refusing to insist upon compound interest?

And then this concluding sentence. Secretary Mellon replied:

I can not see how it could be otherwise.

Now let us see what impression it made upon the British Government when they heard that proposition, made by the Secretary of the Treasury under the Wilson administration. This is what the Chancellor of Great Britain replied:

You are already aware that the British Government accepts, as far as they are concerned, the suggestions of the United States that the demand obligations of the Allies should be funded into long-time obligations, and that for a period of two or three years—preferably three—the interest on the obligations of foreign Governments acquired by the United States should also be funded, and that we are ready to extend similar treatment to our allies in respect of their obligations to us.

Does not the Senator think that that language clearly creates as between the United States and Great Britain the moral obligation that during at least the first one or two or three years of the reconstruction period interest should not be collected?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have told the Senator repeatedly that I accepted the statement of the Secretary of the Treasury that he felt that our Government was morally bound.

Mr. SPENCER. I was not asking how the Secretary of the Treasury felt. I am asking the Senator from Massachusetts whether he does not think we ought to consider that our Government is morally bound?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, may I have the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]? After these negotiations which have just been read is it not a fact that either the Senator from Virginia or his successor as Secretary of the Treasury undertook the refunding of this debt with the British Government, and that Great Britain broke off negotiations without any action being consummated?

Mr. GLASS. I have repeatedly made that statement here; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So I understood—repeatedly. So that that was the end of the negotiations with the British Government; but the present Senator from Virginia himself undertook to refund this debt, and he said on the floor of the Senate a few days ago—I read his speech again yesterday—that for some reason he never was able to find out why the British Government broke off all negotiations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I call the Senator's attention to the further fact that according to the statement which has just been read by the Senator from Missouri he said "two or three years," and that time has expired.

Mr. SPENCER. No; the three years has not expired.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; not the three; but the British representatives said "two years, or preferably three." That did not bind this Government to three years. Certainly the most that could be claimed for it was that it bound us to two years.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts who was Secretary of the Treasury in December, 1919? Was it the present Senator from Virginia or was it Secretary Houston?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, some time before I left the Treasury I dispatched Mr. Rathbone, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of foreign loans, to Europe, and addressed a communication to the foreign Governments stating that this Government was prepared to discuss with their representatives the funding of this indebtedness and the postponement of the payment of the interest—prepared to discuss with them that matter. Mr. Rathbone accordingly went to London and Paris and took up the discussion, and was in process of negotiation—in fact, had made considerable progress in the negotiations for the funding of this indebtedness—when suddenly the negotiations were terminated by Mr. Lloyd-George.

Mr. SPENCER. But will the Senator be good enough, for my own information, to tell me whether on December 2, 1919, the Senator from Virginia was Secretary of the Treasury or Mr. Houston was Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GLASS. I was. I was Secretary of the Treasury until the 2d of February, 1920.

Mr. SPENCER. So I thought. Then this correspondence occurred while the Senator from Virginia was Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, to resume my argument, I recognize the fact that the present administration wants to undertake the refunding of this debt, and I desire now to discuss very briefly the manner in which it should be done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Nebraska for a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Since the Senator was interrupted so much will he permit a further interruption? While the Senator was engaged in his colloquy with the Senator from Missouri I tried to obtain the Senator's attention, but was unable to do so. I wanted to interrupt the Senator on the question that was the subject of that colloquy.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I understand, did not say what he thought. The Senator from Missouri was clearly of the opinion that the correspondence which he read was morally binding on the Congress and the Government of the United States. Does the Senator from Massachusetts agree with that proposition?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think I would have done what Secretary Mellon has done if I had been Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri, then, or the Senator from Massachusetts, who agrees with the Senator from Missouri, if he will say whether he would still feel that the Congress was bound and the Government of the United States was bound if the Secretary of the Treasury had agreed that no interest should be paid for 50 years? Would we be morally bound by that?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think so. I do not think any Secretary of the Treasury had authority to defer the payment of this interest.

Mr. NORRIS. Where is the time, then, where he had the power? Will the Senator place that time? How far could the Secretary go under the law, and where could he not go? If he could agree and bind us by saying: "You need not pay any interest for three years," would it bind us if he had said "three years and six months," or would it bind us if he had said "four years," or would it bind us if he had said "You never need pay the interest"? Where is the time?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think any agreement could have bound us; but, in view of the correspondence and negotiations that passed between this Government under the former administration and the British Government, I do think the new Secretary of the Treasury could have and should have morally recognized that there appeared to be a postponement of the payment of the interest for three years.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator feels that it was not technically a legal postponement——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not think it was.

Mr. NORRIS. But that we are morally bound. I still put the question up to the Senator, Where is the limit on the morality of the question? Would we be morally bound if he had postponed the payment of interest for four years? Would we be morally bound if he had postponed it for five years?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think that when a new Secretary of the Treasury came into office and found that his predecessors had for two years postponed the collection of interest, for some reason or other, or had not collected the interest, and that the foreign Governments claimed that a leeway of six months or a year more was given them, he ought to have done just what Secretary Mellon did, waive any attempt to collect the interest.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has made it perfectly clear that he agreed with Secretary Mellon; but the Senator has not yet answered my question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think legally he could have demanded the interest.

Mr. NORRIS. I am putting the question to the Senator as to how far we can go morally. Where is the limit? I would like to know how far the Secretary of the Treasury, without any law on the subject, can morally bind the Government and bind Congress. If he had put it beyond the term of office of the present administration, would that morally bind us?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly; there is no time limit. No one could waive the legal requirement for the collection of interest due on these debts. But the fact is, that someone did actually give consent—implied at least—to a postponement for two or three years.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not speaking of the legal requirements; I am speaking entirely of the moral requirement. I would like to get the Senator's idea as to how far the Secretary of the Treasury can go in morally binding us. He has said that if he tried to fix the time at 50 years, it would not morally bind us, but that if he fixed it at 3 years, it would morally bind us. Where is the line of morality?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have answered the Senator as best I can by stating the facts in this case. The present Secretary of the Treasury came into office with the claim made that the payment of this interest had been waived, and that there were only a few months remaining before the time would arrive when the interest would become due after the time had expired covered by the waiver of the payment of the interest.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator made his position on that perfectly plain, I think. Of course, the Senator does not have to answer my question; he is under no obligation to answer it, but I would like to have somebody answer it and tell where that line of morality runs. I am curious to know. How far can the Secretary legally bind us, laying aside the technicalities of the question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I regret that I can not fix the hour and the day and the minute when the moral obligation expires. Ordinarily there can be no moral obligation founded on a waiver of legal requirements. But what could anyone do about it?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it ought to be stated here that in the document in which the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury proposed a settlement to the British Government, which the representatives of the British Government substantially accepted, the condition was laid down that the accrued interest should be paid, not in cash but in bonds.

Mr. NORRIS. Where was the authority for that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am coming to that. I do not know that there is any such authority, but the fact was that at that time Great Britain and every other country had defaulted in the payment of the interest. This was in 1919, and those bonds were written a year and a half or two years before. The interest was already in default, and the testimony shows that the Government of the United States was endeavoring to get Great Britain to begin the payment of interest as the one nation able to do it. As an inducement to bring that about, to get Great Britain to agree definitely as to the payment of the interest, Mr. Rathbone suggested that the time limit on the nonpayment should cease in 1922.

Mr. NORRIS. Where was the authority for that?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will come to that in a moment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator can not find it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When the time came for the payment of the interest that had thus accrued, the British representing that they were not able to pay it in cash, it was agreed that they should pay it in bonds. I do not know that it was the intention of the Government at that time, but I assume that the representatives of the Treasury would have submitted that to the Congress of the United States for ratification.

Mr. NORRIS. When they were submitting that to the foreign Governments, if they ever intended to submit it to the Congress of the United States, it seems to me, if they had an eighth-grade education they would have said to the foreign Governments: "We are without authority to give you any extension. We can not modify the contract you made when you borrowed the money, by which you agreed to pay it. We will have to go to Congress to have our act made legal." Nothing of that kind occurred. They assumed all the time that they had the authority, and they did not have any.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is also true that Congress was aware that the interest had not been paid, that Congress was aware that there was a default, and was taking no action to press for payment. I think it may be safely assumed that this was an effort on the part of the Treasury to get a definite agreement out of Great Britain, and probably it would have been submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification, as any agreement now should be submitted to this body for ratification, and I think my colleague agrees with me on that point. But the fact is that in the very document which suggested the deferring of the payment of the interest to this year, it was stipulated that this year it should be paid, and interest should be paid in cash from now on, and what interest has not been paid should be represented in bonds. So it was not intended that the interest should be forgiven, but merely that instead of being practically on a book account, unpaid, it should be represented by securities held by the United States.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Perhaps it is pertinent to state what I have twice before stated to the Senate with reference to this particular point of authority. Mr. Rathbone, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, in charge of the foreign loans, is himself a lawyer of some distinction, of New York City. It was the considered judgment of Mr. Rathbone and of the legal department of the Treasury that the existing Liberty loan statutes gave ample authority to the Secretary of the Treasury to negotiate the funding of these bonds, the defaulted interest included.

There was some suggestion made upon the floor of the other branch of Congress that that authority was not clear, and some disposition shown to question it, whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury addressed a letter—which appears in the Senate document I have before me—to the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, the late Mr. Penrose, and to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, Mr. FORDNEY, stating to those gentlemen that he was advised by the legal authorities of the Treasury that the existing law afforded ample authority for the funding of this debt, the interest included, and saying that if there was the slightest doubt on the part of the Ways and Means Committee of the House or the Finance Committee of the Senate the Treasury would like to be apprised of it, in order that it might ask further authority, if the authority did not then exist, as the Treasury thought it did.

Both the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate and the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, the latter, as I know, after consultation with all the members of that committee, notified the Secretary of the Treasury that they conceded the right of the Treasury to proceed under existing law to fund not only the major indebtedness but the accrued interest, and acting in those circumstances the Secretary of the Treasury dispatched Mr. Rathbone to England to pursue the negotiations.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator from Virginia has made exactly the same statement heretofore, and I think it must be very clear to the Senate that the former administration considered, and had the approval of Congress in the belief, that there was ample authority under the law to refund this debt and the accrued interest.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana and Mr. NORRIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield first to the Senator from Indiana, who has been waiting for some time.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I want to make a partial response to the inquiry addressed by the Senator from Nebraska to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator, before he takes that up, let me refer to the authority spoken of by the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want the Senator from Massachusetts or any other Senator to get the idea, from what I have said, that I am of the opinion that the Secretary of the Treasury does not have the authority. I believe he has always had the authority, not only to refund the principal, but the unpaid interest, and I think that this legislation, therefore, is unnecessary. I am not contending for anything to the contrary; but that he had authority to extend the time of payment beyond that implied by the original law under which they borrowed the money I deny, and always have denied.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. With that statement I am in entire accord.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the testimony before the Finance Committee was all of one tenor, that is to say, as has been repeated on this floor times without number, there was probably no legal warrant for extending the time for the payment of the interest, but because of the fact that we were in war, or had just emerged from war, and because of the fact that our allies or associates in the war were in deep financial distress, which fact was recognized by the Treasury Department, it was suggested to the allied Governments that we enter into negotiations for the funding of the debt. But at the same time it was stated that if it would suit the convenience of the allied Governments, the payment of the accrued interest might be postponed for a time.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has asked what the length of the postponement should be. I think his colleague [Mr. HITCHCOCK] has well responded to the inquiry; but it is affirmatively stated in this language in the agreement, which has been read here times without number, but which it will probably pay to read again:

The Treasury is prepared, at the convenience of the Governments of the Allies, to take up with their representatives the funding of the demand obligations which the United States holds into long-time obligations and at the same time refunding—during the reconstruction period of, say, for a year or two or three years of the interest on the obligations.

For how long?—

Mr. NORRIS. The refunding?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The refunding.

Mr. NORRIS. The refunding of the interest?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Of the interest, during the reconstruction period. The Senator from Nebraska asked if his colleague would agree that the payment of this interest should be postponed for 50 years. He answered no. It was definitely stated here, as definitely as an agreement of that kind could state it, that during the period of reconstruction, say one year, or two years, or three years, the payment of the interest should be postponed; but evidently believing that the period of reconstruction would have expired at the end of three years it was provided that the interest at that time should be paid, or that payments on the interest should begin. I insist that there is a moral obligation, not a lega.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I agree with the Senator. Whether the former administration acted within the law or not, the result was that the new Secretary of the Treasury inherited what I believe was a moral obligation that he very properly carried out. If the time had been more than a few months, he might have insisted on the strict legal position that the original law prescribed.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska that the Secretary of the Treasury had no legal right to postpone the payment of the interest, so that whatever moral obligation exists will expire at the end of the 3-year period, which, I understand, will be reached within a very few months. Therefore, taking into consideration that we ourselves offered that suggestion affirmatively to our debtor nations, a matter not coming from them as their proposition, but going from us to them, under the language I have read; that they accepted it for a period of three years, and the Treasury Department acquiesced in it; that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], then Secretary of the Treasury, reported it and Secretary Houston reported it; and that the Congress of the United States, knowing the facts and circumstances, acquiesced in it, I contend that there is a binding moral obligation that the payment of the interest should be postponed for a period of three years, beyond any doubt, if moral obligations can bind the people to the exclusion of legal obligations.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me to ask the Senator from Indiana a question?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if the moral obligation extends only three years, why does the committee present us a bill which would allow this commission to extend the payments of interest for any length of time it desires until 1947? Why not stop at the end of the moral obligation, the three-year period?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senator asked me that question the other day when I was on the floor, along with half a dozen other questions, and I spent two hours in discussing that whole matter, answering it, as I think, completely. What is the use of going over it again?

Mr. NORRIS. It will take only two hours.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not understand the Senator the other day.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The time for general debate will expire in just a minute.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield again? The Senator has been very kind.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield cheerfully.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Indiana is laboring under the impression now that he has fixed definitely what the moral obligation is, but the truth is that nobody had any authority to make that obligation, and if they had made it for 4 years or 5 years or 10 years, there would not have been any difference, as far as the principle involved is concerned. My question is still unanswered, Where is the limit of the moral obligation, and what is the right and authority of the Treasury Department to make it?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ought to state that at this hour the unanimous-consent agreement takes effect, and that hereafter Senators are limited to 20 minutes on the bill and 10 minutes upon any amendment. There is now an amendment pending.

Mr. NORRIS. May I inquire what is the amendment now pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President—

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Virginia for a brief statement.

Mr. GLASS. Merely to keep the record straight, I feel constrained again to say that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] does not state with entire accuracy the question immediately under discussion.

As a matter of fact this Government never dreamed of suggesting to any foreign Government that it should postpone the payment of its interest. The Government stood ready and anxious at all times to collect the interest on the indebtedness. The representatives of foreign Governments themselves suggested the inability of those Governments to pay the interest, and it was responsive to that suggestion from foreign Governments that the Secretary of the Treasury suggested that the Treasury was prepared to discuss with representatives of foreign Governments the question of funding the principal of this indebtedness and also the postponing of payment of the interest.

That was not an affirmative suggestion by this Government. It was in response to suggestions that certain of the foreign Governments were unable to pay the interest at that time. The Treasury merely signified that it was prepared to discuss the question, and it did enter into the discussion, and the discussion was terminated by those foreign Governments.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the discussion has gone afar from the proposition I undertook to demonstrate, first, that this legislation is not necessary, and, second, that this is not the opportune time to refund our foreign debts. I shall now very briefly discuss the proposition of how, in view of the fact that the majority intend to pass this bill, this debt should be refunded. There are two ways of doing it, publicly or secretly.

Heretofore every transaction in connection with this foreign debt has been in the open. The amount of the loan, the time when the principal should be paid, the rate of interest, the time for the payment of interest—every detail has been known to every American citizen. For the first time the veil of secrecy is to spread over these foreign loans.

Whose money is this $11,000,000,000? From whom did it come? To whom does it belong? It has come from the pockets of the American people and has passed through this Government, as if it were through a conduit, directly into the treasuries of our allies of the late war. Our Government has simply acted as a conduit in sending money from the people of this country to the people of Europe. We made it clear and definite and certain to the people of the country how it should be loaned, what the terms should be, exactly the same terms that our Government promised to make with them in the Liberty bonds which we issued to them in the name of our Government.

Why change that policy now? Certainly there is no object in changing it and making the transaction secret if it is of benefit to the American people. The only object there can be in making the transaction secret now is because something unfavorable to the American people is going to take place. Who can object to the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] or the amendment which I offered along the same line? If the result of this refunding is to be as favorable as the present law or the present agreement, or if it is to be made more favorable to America, then what Senator or Congressman will hesitate to approve and ratify any agreement that is made?

There is just one reason for secrecy. There is one reason for now hiding from the American people for the first time the negotiations about this debt between foreign Governments and our own Government, and that is in order to make some agreement, some compromise, some rearrangement of this debt on more favorable terms to our debtors than now exists. As the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] pointed out only a moment ago, whatever terms are made that are more favorable than the present law provides for will come out of the pockets of the American people in additional tax burdens.

Thus, Mr. President, I urge that we proceed, if the present administration is bound to this course, to refund this debt openly and publicly, and that we limit the authority which we give to these commissioners who are to negotiate this refunding proposition, so that our approval and sanction will be necessary before these negotiations are legal. It is one thing to give them power to negotiate for the refunding of these debts, but it is indefensible for us, as the representatives of the people who toiled and sacrificed to raise this money, to permit these negotiations to become binding on our people regardless of our approval or consent. Let our people know every step and every move that is made to postpone collection or substitute securities for their money. We, not this commission, are responsible for this most valuable asset. If it is lost or impaired in value we are responsible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to take my time on the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Vice President, as President of the Senate, has ruled that under such circumstances as now surround us, while an amendment is pending a Senator may not use his time allotted to the bill itself. The Chair would be glad to be advised by some one who may have been present when the ruling was made whether he is correct with regard to the matter.

Mr. WALSH of Massachustts. I had supposed that after 3 o'clock a Senator might take 10 minutes upon any pending amendment and 20 minutes upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has no disposition to overrule a decision made by the President of the Senate, but will adhere to that ruling unless the Senate otherwise determines.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state the inquiry.

Mr. KING. I am not sure that I apprehend exactly the position of the Chair, but as I understand the rule which is now governing us, a Senator may speak 20 minutes on the bill, or on any subject which he pleases, and then follow it, if an amendment is pending, for 10 minutes; that is, he may take his entire 30 minutes when there is an amendment pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that to have been the ruling of the President of the Senate, but the Chair will be glad to be advised with respect to the matter.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me a mere suggestion——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. My understanding is that any Senator may speak after 3 o'clock for 20 minutes on the bill itself and for 10 minutes on any amendment. I assume that a Senator may choose which one he will speak on first, but I would suggest where a Senator intends to utilize his 20 minutes upon the bill, in order that the Chair may be governed in fixing the time, the Senator announce when he rises that he is talking to the bill and not to an amendment. Then the Chair will have no difficulty whatever in determining the time the Senator is taking in conformity with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I hope this is not coming out of my time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will assure the Senator from Massachusetts that this time will not be charged against him.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to call attention to a violation of the unanimous-consent agreement which I admit often takes place. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes upon the bill or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment offered thereto. It is a physical impossibility for any Senator to talk on the bill when there is technically an amendment pending before the Senate. While he may talk about the weather or anything he pleases, he is conclusively presumed to be talking about the motion that is then pending before the Senate. When a motion is pending, no matter what the Senator says, he is conclusively presumed to be talking to that motion.

Now, a motion is pending and under the unanimous-consent agreement I claim, and I do not believe anybody can successfully controvert it, that he can not talk about the bill and can not be presumed to be talking about the bill or to the bill as long as that amendment is pending. If he ever talks about the bill or to the bill, he does so when there is no amendment pending before the Senate. That ought to be the ruling of the Chair, because that is right, no matter what has been done in the past.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska has stated the ruling which, as the present occupant of the chair understands it, has been made by the President of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I took the floor about a quarter past two and I have had the opportunity to deliver my argument during only about 15 minutes of that time. I shall accept the ruling of the Chair and resume discussion of the bill when some other amendment is under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Senate clearly understand the application of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Chair will entertain an observation, I do not agree with the construction placed upon the rule by the distinguished Senator from Nebraska. Permit me briefly to call attention to the phraseology of the unanimous-consent agreement:

> It is agreed by unanimous consent that * * * no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 20 minutes upon the bill * * * or more than once or longer than 10 minutes upon any amendment.

It was known when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into that there were amendments pending. I doubt that any Senator understood that he was to be denied discussion of the bill for a period of 20 minutes, until every amendment was disposed of, because some Senators doubtless intended to speak upon the bill, not upon an amendment, and they expected to speak upon the bill before disposition was made of all the amendments.

My understanding is that under the rule, when the phraseology of the unanimous-consent agreement is similar to that found here, a Senator might speak at any time before the vote was taken upon the passage of the bill, either upon an amendment, if one were pending, or upon the bill, for the period which was agreed upon. It seems to me that has been the practice and I confess my surprise to learn that a different practice is now insisted upon as the rule of the Senate. I submit for the consideration of the Chair that this language means that a Senator may speak 20 minutes on the bill at any time whether an amendment is pending or whether the bill itself is pending.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senator speaking upon the pending amendment?

Mr. KING. I am speaking to a parliamentary inquiry to get enlightenment from the Chair, if I do not succeed in enlightening the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that this exact point has been ruled on not only by the present President of the Senate, but by a former President of the Senate, so that no matter what the opinion of the present occupant of the Chair may be, he does not feel that he can overrule or ought to overrule a decision already made. The Chair suggests that, in answer to a parliamentary inquiry already made, he expressed the opinion that the unanimous-consent agreement could be modified by unanimous consent without the 24 hours' notice provided by Rule XII.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand the ruling of the Chair, no Senator then may speak on the bill until the amendments have been disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah will understand that when the bill itself is pending and under consideration, and no amendment is pending, a Senator may speak for 20 minutes upon the bill. The Chair may say that during most of the day there has been no amendment pending, and if that condition should continue, then a Senator could speak for 20 minutes.

Mr. KING. I suggest to Senators who have amendments that so long as Senators desire to discuss the bill for the 20 minutes they withdraw their amendments temporarily, in order to give opportunity for Senators to exhaust their 20 minutes, and then to renew their amendments.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KING. I have not any time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think we can arrange the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota is recognized.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate give such construction to the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are now operating that any Senator may declare when he rises whether he is speaking to the bill or to a pending amendment; that if he states he is speaking to the bill he may be allowed 20 minutes, and if he makes no statement he will be presumed to be speaking to the pending amendment. Such a construction would clarify the matter, and I can see no objection to it. Let any Senator for himself determine whether he wants to speak on the bill or on an amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into it was understood that the practice should continue which has prevailed for 10 years or more in the Senate, contrary to the rulings which have been made by the present occupant of the Chair and his predecessor, namely, that a Senator could at any time speak on the bill and also on the pending amendment. I read from the debate which occurred at the time when the unanimous-consent agreement was entered into:

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It will be satisfactory to me, but other Senators suggest 3 o'clock. I suggest that we meet at 11 o'clock, and that at 3 o'clock on Monday debate shall be limited to 20 minutes on the bill and 10 minutes on each amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. That will give half an hour altogether.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; and even more than that, if a Senator should desire to discuss more than one amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I shall not object to that.

It seems to me that that was the understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the Chair must be guided by the unanimous-consent agreement as it appears from the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. But I think the unanimous-consent agreement was as I have stated.

Mr. NORRIS. Every Senator may have a half hour if he wishes to, and the time will come when every Senator may talk on the bill under the construction which has been given the unanimous-consent agreement by the Chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. After every amendment has been voted upon a Senator may do so.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; but the Senator is assuming that after a Senator speaks to an amendment he must discuss something else.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; the Senator knows that heretofore when a Senator rose to speak on the bill he would say, "I am speaking on the bill," and when his time on the bill was exhausted he would say, "I will now speak on the amendment."

Mr. NORRIS. I have seen also the practice followed as announced by the Chair.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has also seen the practice followed of a Senator offering an amendment in order to extend his remarks. That has been done.

Mr. NORRIS. And a Senator may do it yet. This proposition does not prevent any Senator speaking 20 minutes on the bill when the amendment is disposed of. If a Senator has the floor before another amendment is offered, he can speak 20 minutes. So a Senator can speak 20 minutes after another amendment shall have been disposed of or after all amendments shall have been disposed of. No Senator will be prevented from speaking 20 minutes. It seems to me that the construction by the Chair of the unanimous-consent agreement is the only one that the language will bear, and I object to a modification of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the understanding proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]?

Mr. NORRIS. I object, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. ASHURST called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. McKELLAR. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is the roll about to be called for a quorum or for a vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] suggested the absence of a quorum, and the roll is about to be called upon that demand.

Mr. McKELLAR. A point of order. The yeas and nays were called for and ordered, and the Secretary was directed to call the roll. He called the name of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. Under the rule, I submit that no other motion is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee, inasmuch as the Senator from Arizona had not answered on the roll call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in view of what has transpired in respect to the calling of the roll and the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, I ask the Senator from North Dakota, in charge of the bill, if it is his intention to have an adjournment because of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think I have a right to argue the question now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is not in order pending the calling of the roll. The Secretary will proceed with the calling of the roll to ascertain whether or not a quorum is present.

On the roll call the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Glass	McKellar	Smoot
Ball	Hale	McKinley	Spencer
Borah	Harris	McLean	Stanley
Brandegee	Harrison	McNary	Sterling
Broussard	Heflin	Moses	Sutherland
Bursum	Hitchcock	Myers	Swanson
Capper	Johnson	Nelson	Townsend
Caraway	Jones, N. Mex.	Nicholson	Underwood
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Norris	Wadsworth
Culberson	Kellogg	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Kenyon	Overman	Walsh, Mont.
Curtis	Keyes	Page	Warren
Dial	King	Phipps	Watson, Ga.
Dillingham	Ladd	Pittman	Watson, Ind.
Edge	La Follette	Poindexter	Weller
Ernst	Lenroot	Robinson	Williams
Fernald	Lodge	Sheppard	Willis
Fletcher	McCormick	Shields
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Simmons

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that amendment.

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask that the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have already been ordered. At the request of the Senator from North Carolina, the Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. At the bottom of page 2 it is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. When, under and in accordance with section 2, the said commission shall with any country reach an agreement of adjustment, settlement, or refunding, such agreement, before it is consummated or becomes final, shall be reported to and shall be approved by Congress.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California which has been stated. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. In his absence I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. NEWBERRY] and vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], which I transfer to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. TRAMMELL's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL] is necessarily absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea" on this question. I understand that he has a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. McCORMICK (after having voted in the negative). I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], who, I notice, is not in the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 36, nays 44, as follows:

So Mr. JOHNSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I sent to the desk on Friday. I understand that it will be necessary first to reconsider the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], which was adopted, and which the Senator said he would be willing to have reconsidered at the proper time for the purpose of making my amendment in order. I refer to the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota fixing the rate of interest at 4½ per cent.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator desires to have that reconsidered in order that he may offer which amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment providing for the payment of the interest semiannually or annually, as provided in existing law.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the Senate adopted the amendment referred to by the Senator from North Carolina, as amended, may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The vote by which the amendment, as amended, was adopted is reconsidered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask to have my amendment to the amendment stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the amendment already agreed to, at the foot of page 2, a comma and the words:

payable semiannually or annually in accordance with the provisions of existing law.

So that if amended the proviso will read:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or obligations due the United States of America by any foreign Government beyond June 15, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually or annually, in accordance with the provisions of existing law.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I was not here at the time the unanimous-consent agreement was made, but I understand that we are allowed only 10 minutes upon an amendment. Am I correct?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not wish to review the arguments that have been made with respect to this amendment, except in the briefest possible way.

I wish to state again before the vote is taken that the Secretary of the Treasury has made it perfectly clear to my mind, at least, in his testimony before that committee that his preference as to settling this foreign indebtedness was to take obligations or bonds for the principal indebtedness and to cover the deferred interest into a higher interest rate. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if that method of settlement is adopted, inevitably the people of the United States never will receive for this indebtedness any more than the principal of the bonds and interest that may hereafter accumulate. They will lose every dollar of the interest that has already accumulated. They will lose practically every dollar of the interest that may hereafter be accumulated as the result of an extension of interest payments, and all of it wrapped up in the interest rate will go to the purchasers of those bonds in case they are ever put upon the market and sold; and we have been notified that the White House is now considering a proposition to take the $4,000,000,000 of bonds due us by Great Britain and place them upon the market and sell them to raise the money with which to pay the soldiers' bonus.

Secondly, Mr. President, I desire to call attention to the fact that if this arrangement is made, and the interest is further deferred, as the Secretary of the Treasury indicated was his purpose, and the time for interest payments is extended in some cases 3, 4, 5, and 10 years, the way is paved by the action of the Secretary of the Treasury by which the private individuals who hold the five billions of privately owned foreign bonds will be enabled to collect their debt before the United States Government is able to collect its debt. It will be a legal priority, created by act of Congress, in favor of the great national and international private bondholders of this country.

Mr. President, I think I have made myself clear upon that point. I want to say to Senators on the other side of the Chamber that if they want to take the risk of an arrangement by the Secretary of the Treasury—and he said that was his preference; he said the President approved it—if the Senators on the other side wish to take the risk of an arrangement by the Secretary of the Treasury, the closest and most intimate representative in this country to-day of the interests that will be benefited, let them do it; and if the result that I have predicted shall come and the international bankers shall be given a present of the accumulated interest of a billion of dollars upon these bonds, let the responsibility be upon them and the Republican Party. If Senators on the other side are willing that an arrangement shall be made by which the billion of dollars now due the American people as a result of the sacrifices they made in raising this money that was lent during the war shall be postponed in order to give the international bankers of the United States an opportunity first to collect both their principal and their interest, let them do it. The responsibility will rest squarely on them and the political party which for the moment is in the majority in all branches of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I noticed a remark in the address of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] which rather grated upon my feelings. He spoke of Senators "upon the other side" of the Chamber wanting to do this or that. This is not a party question, Mr. President; it is a matter of foreign relations, of international relations. It far transcends any question of partisan character.

I do not suppose there is a man in this body whose politics come nearer being his religion than mine; but politics stop at the seashore. During President Wilson's administration I found occasion once to denounce a great partisan conspiracy directed against the peace of the world in the name of a war upon a Democratic President. Now that I and my party are in the minority, I am not going to forget that.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina says that he is afraid we will not receive any more than the bond and interest. What more do we want than the bond and interest?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I beg the pardon of the Senator, if he will permit me to interrupt him.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I can not yield. I have only 10 minutes.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator misrepresents me. I did not say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I appeal to the stenographer's notes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that we would not get more than the principal, while the international bankers would get the interest.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not want this taken out of my time. The Senator's exact language, as I took it down at the time, was that we would not receive any more than the bond and interest, and his assertion was that the payment of the interest would be postponed, and that maybe in the long run we would get nothing more than the bond and the interest at the time of entering into the contract; in other words, we would miss the interest upon the interest, which is, in ordinary language, compound interest.

Suppose some of these people who owe our people something can not pay anything at all next year, or the year after, or the year after that, but come before us, their creditor, they as humble debtors, and say, "If you let us put the interest into the note and make the note payable sufficiently far in the future, we can pay both principal and interest; but if you demand the interest every year, we simply can not pay it." Suppose that appeal were made to you by individual debtors and you are creditors, and it was put upon a common-sense business basis, would your answer be, "No; because maybe after a while I will get nothing except the bond, or the note, and the interest, and the interest deferred for several years, with the loss of the interest on the interest." That is what it means. In other words, you want to come forward as a great Nation and say, "I want bond and interest, and interest upon interest, compound interest, if you can not pay the interest."

I do not know what Senators may think of that, but I would not treat one of my debtors that way, if he were crippled. This is not a tradesman's proposition; it is not a money lender's proposition. This is an international question. It is a question between "gentleman" nations, who, a short while ago, were fighting for their lives and their civilization, and the Senate is insisting upon treating it as if it were a bond for a pound of flesh, or a bond for a hundred dollars with interest at 10 per cent, payable semiannually.

Mr. President, if there is anything in the history of the Democratic Party, from the time of Thomas Jefferson, when he organized it, down to now, which compels me to adopt that sort of a policy, I do not know it; and if there is anything in the Republican Party which compels Senators on the other side to adopt it—and there may be, because I am not acquainted with your ethics very well, if you have any ethics—then go ahead and adopt it.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I want to treat this matter as if it were a question of honor between gentlemen. We went to one another's assistance, to save the civilization and the freedom and the property rights of the world, and to save the democracy of the world, and, however much you may scorn the phrase, to make this world a safe place for democracy, and then after we are through with the fighting, after we have whipped the enemy, after we have entered into an armistice which amounted to a peace, then we come to one another and say, "You owe me a dime; pay it. You owe me a hundred dollars, or a million dollars, or a billion dollars. Pay it, and pay the interest semiannually." What are you going to do if they can not pay it? Are you going to make war on them because they can not?

When Mr. Wilson was President of the United States I stood here and contended day after day that the American people and the American Senate owed him something as President ex officio. We owe something to the Executive all the time, in foreign relations. The Constitution has conferred upon the Executive the privilege of initiating foreign relations, and I believe what is wrong about this bill in the main is that it too much limits that power, and as a Democrat, especially representing in a sort of a way a part of the southern Democracy, a Democracy of chivalry and of generosity, I am not willing to stand here and insist upon Shylock's pound of flesh, and insist that it be paid at periodical times, annually and semiannually, and if not, that the interest upon the interest shall be computed, and compound interest shall be paid by our debtors and received by us.

Mr. President, as far as I am concerned, I shall vote against the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, and if I had been present when the amendment to which that is an amendment was adopted, I would have voted against that.

A part of this bill deprives the Executive of the power even to negotiate for the exchange of bonds of our different debtors. Suppose 10 of you owed me money, and one of you came to me and said, "I have B's note for so much, and he is much more solvent than I am. Let me pay you in B's note." Would I not be a fool, as a business man, to say no? Suppose one of you came to me and said, "I am bankrupt. I am insolvent. I can not pay you in full, but I can hand you C's obligation to me, and D's obligation to me, and E's obligation to me, and you get out of it what you can, and I will not take advantage of the bankruptcy law; I will try to pay the balance." Would you say no? Would you especially say it if it was an affair between gentlemen, late associates in the Great War, instead of being merely an affair between debtors and money lenders?

I protest that this business shall not be put upon the basis of money lenders' ethics.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina suggests that unless his amendment be adopted, it will be possible for this commission, instead of adding the interest due at the time the new bonds are accepted, to amortize that interest by a higher rate upon the original principal, and that the bonds would then be sold to private parties and the Government and the people would lose the accumulated interest.

I had supposed, Mr. President, that it had been accepted upon both sides of the aisle that under the bill as it now stands, the commission would have no such power as the Senator from North Carolina has suggested. The chairman of the Finance Committee the other day gave it as his construction that the commission would not have any such power. I feel very clear that it would not; but if there be any doubt about it, if the Senator from North Carolina, if he has any doubt about it, would offer an amendment upon that point, I should personally be very glad to support it.

However, the amendment the Senator now proposes does not affect that question either way. If there be anything in the Senator's point, the commission would have exactly the same power after his amendment was adopted that it would have without the amendment. His amendment has only to do with the interest provided in the bond, whether it be upon the original principal, or whether it be upon the original principal plus the accumulated interest, and that affects only the question of whether that interest, when it is paid, shall be paid semiannually or annually, or whether the commission shall have discretion to postpone the payment of the interest for a period of time.

Under any construction the commission has no power to cancel this interest or any part of the principal, and if there was the slightest ground for the construction that the Senator now proposes to give, that there would be any authority in the commission to forego the interest due at the time the bonds shall be taken, not adding it to the principal, I would be glad to join with the Senator in clearing up any doubt on that question.

As for myself, I have no doubt. In my opinion, under the bill as it stands the commission has no such power, but the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina does not affect that question either way. So that when the Senator urges as one reason for the adoption of his amendment the argument that it would prevent the commission from doing this thing, the Senator, it seems to me, must see that he is entirely mistaken and that it has no relevancy to it whatever.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, it is rather amusing to me to hear the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] deplore having this made a party question, when it is somewhat notorious that the Senators on the other side of the aisle have had at least one and, I think, two party caucauses on the subject and practically bound their members who participated in the caucus to swallow the whole thing as presented to the Senate. There were some Senators on the other side who either withdrew from the caucus or refused to participate in it, but those who did participate in the caucus have evidently considered the matter settled, and very few of them have been in the Senate during the discussion of the merits of the question. It is very evident that they are voting upon this matter as a party question, supporting the party administration in the demand it is making for the creation of a commission with tremendous discretionary power.

Nor can I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that the Senator from North Carolina by the amendment which he offers is attempting to collect the last pound of flesh from the debtors in this case. He is not attempting to collect interest on interest. That is not the proposition. The question simply is whether this commission shall be given the tremendous discretionary power of postponing indefinitely the time for the payment of the interest.

The Senator from North Carolina proposes that the interest shall be paid semiannually and annually in accordance with our existing law in relation to the bonds we issued to produce the money for these loans. If his amendment is beaten, the commission will have the power to say that interest may be paid once in 10 years, or once in 20 years, or at the end of the whole period of time, and that would be equivalent to a great gift of money which belongs to the people of the United States.

Mr. President, I have said heretofore to-day that I am not standing here saying that no concession should be made to these debtors, and that nothing should be done to ease up on the payment of a very difficult debt for them. What I say is that Congress should not abdicate its power and convey to a commission or to the Secretary of the Treasury the tremendous power to decide those questions.

This is a question involving hundreds of millions of dollars, and I expect thousands of millions of dollars, and it is not right for the represenatives of the people to turn over to that commission the power to say whether or not the interest shall be paid annually or semiannually or once in 10 years. To defer the interest for such a great length of time as they would have the power to do under this bill is to make an enormous gift. Therefore I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

I believe that Congress should decide whether we are to alleviate the condition of this contract, that the representatives of the people, and not a little commission of men selected by the Executive, should decide this important question and vote away the money which belongs to the people of the United States. I say that we here in the Congress of the United States should decide it and not have a little commission, subject to all sorts of influences, vested with tremendous power to vote away money that belongs to the people of the United States. I am in favor of this amendment to the amendment as one of the restrictive measures, one of the measures we have already forced into the bill, in order to limit the powers of the commission.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I voted for the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] because it does not seem to me that the commission provided for in the bill ought to be authorized to make a settlement of these debts, to which Congress might be opposed. It seems to me if the debts are to be extended for a period of years or possibly a quarter of a century, any settlement made by the commission or its successors ought to be such a settlement as would meet the approval of Congress.

But I am not able to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, among other things, for one or two of the reasons suggested by the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, if applied strictly and rigidly, and it does not seem susceptible of any other application, would compel a nation which knew that it could not pay its interest annually to agree to pay it annually, thereby compelling it to agree to what it knew it could not perform, or else it would prevent any settlement whatever with that nation. One of those alternatives must be true. I have no doubt there are nations which can not in the next two years pay their annual interest on the sums they owe this Government. I am not willing to vote for an amendment which would prevent any settlement with them or which would compel them to make an international contract, if they would consent to make it, when they knew in advance that they could not perform the terms of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to remove every possible doubt as to the meaning of my amendment. To meet the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] I wish to change my amendment so as to add immediately at the close thereof the following words:

Or to authorize the commission to amortize accumulated interest by including such interest in the rate of interest to be charged.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina modifies his amendment and the Secretary will report it as modified.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add after the words "existing law" the following:

Or to authorize the commission to amortize accumulated interest by including such interest in the rate of interest to be charged.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina to explain just how there may be an amortization of the interest when the interest rate is fixed by existing law and the maturity also? How would it be possible to do that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has exhausted his time on the pending amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it strikes me that this is in the nature of a new amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, a point of order. It is an amendment in the third degree, as I understand it.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I am simply perfecting my amendment. This was added to my amendment.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is modifying his own amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Of course that is all right.

Mr. GLASS. I will not confine my inquiry to the Senator from North Carolina. I would like some Senator, who is as well posted about matters of finance as is the Senator from North Carolina, to tell me exactly how this may be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator that I myself have not seen the necessity for the amendment, and I thought my original amendment accomplished the purpose which I had in mind and avoided the difficulty that I have explained to the Senate. However, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] raised the question and suggested that I offer an amendment which would accomplish the object he had in mind. He said he would be glad to vote for it then. I drafted this modification and showed it to the Senator from Wisconsin, and I understood him to approve of the amendment as I have modified it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. GLASS. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr LENROOT. The Senator from Wisconsin stated that he did not believe the bill did authorize any such transaction as the Senator from North Carolina contemplated, but that the Senator from Wisconsin, if the Senator from North Carolina had any doubt about it, was willing to support any amendment which would permit it.

Mr. GLASS. It could not authorize it with the rate of interest fixed, and the maturity determined.

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither does the amendment which I have offered.

Mr McCUMBER. Mr. President, a point of order. The unanimous-consent agreement is not being adhered to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent agreement is not being violated. The Senator from Virginia had a right to speak for 10 minutes on the amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from North Carolina will leave his amendment as it was originally.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no sort of objection to that. I only did it to accommodate the view taken by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator from North Carolina think he will get the votes of other Senators by adopting that course?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not.

Mr. BORAH. He might lose the vote of the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am satisfied with the original amendment, and I withdraw the proposed modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the committee amendment, the modification having been withdrawn.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of my pair and its transfer as on the previous vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. McCORMICK (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). On this vote I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when Mr. TRAMMELL's name was called). I wish to make the same announcement as before as to the absence and pair of my colleague [Mr. TRAMMELL].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McKELLAR (after having voted in the affirmative). I have already voted. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). I observe that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has not voted. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] is paired with the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 49, as follows:

So Mr. SIMMONS's amendment to the amendment of the committee as amended was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Let the amendment be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the committee amendment as amended.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment of the committee as amended is as follows: Beginning on page 2, line 20, after the word "therefor," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing contained in this act shall be construed to authorize or empower the commission to extend the time of maturity of any such bonds or obligations due the United States by any foreign Government beyond June 15, 1947, or to fix the rate of interest at less than 4½ per cent per annum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. REED. I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. I move, at the end of the amendment, after the words "per annum," to insert the words "or to defer the time of payment of interest in any case for more than two years."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to say a word or two on the amendment to the committee amendment. I offer the amendment by way of a compromise and in the hope that it may receive the serious consideration of the Senate.

In a word, the bill as drawn, without some qualifying phrase, will give to the Secretary of the Treasury the authority to defer the payment of interest forever. It is an authority which we ought not to grant. Taking it as a fact that there are certain countries which will be unable to meet their interest immediately, a two years' further extension—four years having already been granted—is certainly long enough to satisfy any argument that may be made in favor of an extension of time.

Of course, this is not a partisan question, as stated by the Senator from Mississippi; it is a great international question; but it has been made pretty much a partisan question by a caucus. I hope that the caucus action is not of such character as absolutely to compel the Members of the Republican Party to vote down all amendments that may be offered. If that course is pursued, then, of course, there is no use in offering any further amendments. If the Secretary of the Treasury is to draw this bill, have it reported, have it acted upon by a Republican Party caucus, and if that is the end of the whole matter, then we might as well recognize the fact.

To take the bonds of a country and defer the interest thereon for more than two years from this date—four years of interest deferment having already occurred—is nothing short of a vote by Congress to permit the Secretary of the Treasury practically to nullify these debts. It is, I think, without using any harsh terms, describable only in the statement that it is a repudiation of our obligation to the American people. It is such a power as has never been vested in the hands of any one man. The fact that a commission will have been appointed will not save the face of the matter at all, for the commssion will be completely subservient to and controlled by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I wanted to say that much, and I hope that we may have a vote upon the amendment to the amendment upon its merits and not controlled by caucus action.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, there has never been a binding "caucus" of any kind held by the Republicans of the Senate at any time since I have been here, so far as I am aware. I think it was tried by the Democratic Party lately to bind their Members in the Senate by a two-thirds vote, but I believe they gave it up. There was a conference held in reference to this bill, the matter was discussed, as such matters always have been, but there was not a binding "caucus." I repeat that we have never had a binding "caucus."

To the suggestion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] there is, it seems to me, one very complete objection. If we insert in this proposed legislation a limitation of two, three, or four years, or whatever the time may be, every Nation will claim it. One Nation, at least, is able to begin its semiannual payments of interest the moment binding arrangements shall have been made.

If we fix the date at two years, all nations will claim it. Such a provision would simply put off the payment of the interest to the nations which can afford to begin the payment at once; and, perhaps, such a limitation as affecting other nations would be so narrow, as the Senator from Connecticut pointed out in connection with the last amendment, that it would lead either to their giving a bond which they might repudiate or to no agreement at all.

I think it is not going too far to say that in a great international transaction of this character it is not unreasonable to presume that the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, or whoever may compose the proposed commission are not going to act like idiots or knaves or traitors any more than did the last Secretary of the Treasury, to whom we gave in time of war the immense power of extending these credits. In the financial dealings of the Government we must trust our authorized fiscal agents. We always have done so; I know of no case where they have defrauded the country or undertaken to do anything in connection with financial transactions which was not for the interest of the American people.

It seems to me this particular amendment, although designed to hamper the Secretary of the Treasury, will simply lead to our giving another general extension to all of the debtor nations, whether they are able to pay or not.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator has already spoken once.

Mr. REED. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will yield for a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Massachusetts think for a moment that all of the debtor nations are not going to know from time to time of the extensions granted to any of them? Great Britain, for example, will know in advance that we propose to give an extension to Czechoslovakia, and that that will be just as detrimental to our settlement with Great Britain as though we wrote into this bill a provision that there should in no case be an extension longer than two years.

Mr. LODGE. I think that they will know when the arrangements come to be made what extensions we make. Undoubtedly we shall have to make different extensions of time to the various debtor nations.

Mr. REED. Then why if they know that would they not all insist on equal extensions?

Mr. LODGE. If we establish a hard and fast limitation of two years they will all want it.

Mr. REED. Why will they not be just as insistent if they know that in certain instances extensions are to be granted which are indefinite in point of time as they will if they know that the extensions which might be made could not run beyond two years?

Mr. LODGE. Because in the one case they are perfectly aware that we are making a different arrangement, perhaps, with each country, and that what we do in dealing with one country does not in the least govern what we do in dealing with another; but if we should lay down a hard, fast limitation of two years every nation would come under such a provision and, of course, they would take advantage of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has stated in his objection to this amendment the objection which has so strongly presented itself to me and to which I adverted to-day to leaving the proposition out of the bill entirely. The Senator is of the opinion that if we insert in the bill a provision that the time of the payment of interest shall not be time extended beyond two years, all of the debtor nations will claim an extension up to that time; and I think probably that is true. But if we leave out of the bill any provision at all with reference to the payment of interest and all the debtor nations will be informed as the negotiation proceeds as to what is taking place between different nations, the same question exactly will arise. In other words, the Congress in advance has served notice on the nations of Europe that, so far as Congress is concerned, we do not expect the payment of interest except upon such terms and conditions and discretion as the debtor nations themselves will propose.

If we should insert in the bill a provision that interest should be paid within a certain time, and any particular nation should not be able to pay it, the Secretary of the Treasury could take that circumstance into consideration, and, under the amendment which was offered by the Senator from California, the fact be reported back to Congress; but now we are serving notice on them that, without their having asked for an extension, we consider their situation to be such that they may postpone the time within their own discretion. If they say to the Secretary of the Treasury, "We are not able to pay the interest for five years," what is the Secretary of the Treasury going to say to them? If they say they are not able to pay it for 10 years, what is the Secretary of the Treasury going to say to them? We are taking their word for it; he must take their word just the same as we have taken their word. I should like to ask before I sit down has any nation asked for an extension of time before their payment shall begin?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I will answer that. The only request that I know of in that respect is shown by their actions in not paying interest and saying they could not, and their actions are much stronger than words.

Mr. BORAH. Of course the Senator can argue upon that proposition, but what I want to know is, Has any nation indicated that it wanted to postpone the payment of interest?

Mr. LODGE. I think they have indicated it, for they have all postponed it.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so. They have postponed it; and now we, by an act of Congress, invite them to ask for a postponement again.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see that at all. I think when they get the authority to make these arrangements for the new bonds it would be perfectly preposterous to suppose that Great Britain—which is a solvent nation and will undoubtedly pay her debts—would say, "You have given an extension of two or three years to Finland or Poland." Finland owes us $8,000,000. "Therefore you must give a similar extension to us, who owe you $4,000,000,000." Of course that would not stand for a moment with any nation whose credit must be maintained as the British credit must be maintained.

Mr. BORAH. It would be just as preposterous, if this clause were inserted here by the Senator from Missouri, to claim that England would ask for two years' extension because we proposed to give two years' extension to Czechoslovakia.

Mr. LODGE. Ah, no; if you give it to all the world, that is a different thing.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. BORAH. We are not giving it to all the world.

Mr. LODGE. You are, substantially, by that hard-and-fast limit.

Mr. BORAH. No; we are simply proposing that in no instance shall the time be extended over two years. It does not say that all interest shall be extended for two years, but that in no instance shall it be extended beyond that. That is all it says.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, my objection to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is that it extends the time too long. It is, however, a shortening of the time in the bill, which is indefinite. It all comes back to the fact that no one knows now just what Governments are going to ask for time, and what Governments are going to be able to pay promptly, and what Governments have been able to pay their interest during the past three years. There is not any doubt but that several Governments have been able to pay, and would have paid before this; and yet I am not one who would object to a continuation of the time that has already been given if it were brought about in a proper way.

We come back, therefore, to this proposition: The Secretary of the Treasury has now, and has had every day since every dollar of this money was loaned to the foreign Governments, all the authority that he needs, all that he needs now, for the purpose of refunding this debt and putting it into bonds in accordance with the Liberty loan acts. If it be true that any Government could not pay without hardship and could give a respectable reason for it, I certainly would be one who would favor extending time to them, no matter what Government it might be. I do not want to work any hardship upon any Government; but the way to find out is to proceed to enforce the law that we now have on the statute books, and let the Government that can not pay say so, and give its reason for it to the Secretary of the Treasury.

So we come back to the proposition which we will have an opportunity to vote on before we get through, as to whether the only reasonable route to travel now is not to say to these Governments: "Here is your debt. We want to put it in the form of a bond according to the law that existed under which you borrowed it." They knew what the law was when they borrowed it, as we knew what it was when we loaned it. That contract has been made. It has been in existence all the time. If it is a hardship to anybody and they can give any reasonable rule for changing it or modifying it, I should be glad to change it or modify it; but no Government has come to us for a modification.

We have no notice of anybody demanding more time, and here we propose in this bill to make the time indefinite. If there were anything in the proposition that putting in a limitation according to the pending amendment would be notice to all the world, and everybody would ask for it, as the Senator from Massachusetts said, then we have a much worse proposition already in the bill. We have here a power to a commission to extend the time indefinitely. If it is going to work that way, why will not every Government, the first thing after this law is passed, say: "We want 10 years; we want an indefinite time," and there is no limit but the sky that can be given?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we will take the law as it is, and in a respectful, decent way require every Government to comply with it that can comply with it, and, in the case of those that can not, take up their cases and report them back, there is no doubt but that Congress would give such consideration to them as they deserve, and extend to any worthy countries more time if they needed more time and asked for it. So far nobody has asked for it. So far nobody knows whether anybody wants more time. Therefore, Mr. President, it seems to me that I would favor any limitation on this, the shorter the better, because it will sooner bring us to the time when, if there is such an obstacle in the way, we will come up against it. We ought to have known about it long ago.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to refer to a remark made by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who asked:

> What is the Secretary of the Treasury going to do about this if we do not adopt this amendment?

I assume that the Secretary of the Treasury is going to do exactly what the Senator from Nebraska has indicated he ought to do under the existing law: He is going to try to get the very best terms he can from each one of these debtors. He is going to hear their statements; he is going to verify their claims as to their ability to pay the principal or interest; and if he thinks they can pay the interest annually or semiannually he is going to insist upon their doing it. He is going to insist upon it whether we put in the Reed amendment, now pending, or not. He is not going to extend the term for their payment of interest to two years unless he thinks it is necessary, even if we should adopt the Reed amendment. I assume that he is going to hold every one to the payment of its debt and the interest upon it if it can be collected.

In answer, however, to the question of the Senator from Idaho, "What is the Secretary going to do about it if they say they can not pay the interest?" I desire to suggest that the Secretary will do exactly what the Senator from Idaho or I or any other Senator would do. If they will not pay, the Secretary will probably report that fact to Congress, and Congress can say what shall be done. If they say they can not pay and will not pay, I assume there is nothing except to consider whether we will go and attempt to collect it or not. I know of but one way of collecting it, and that is the same way that was tried by a foreign government against Venezuela when Grover Cleveland was President, and they did not collect anything by that method.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator says that the Secretary of the Treasury will probably report back to Congress. I do not know why he should report back to Congress. The Senate has just voted that it does not desire to have him report back to Congress.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; as I understand the Senate has just voted that it would not be necessary for the agreements made by the commission to be approved by Congress before they went into effect; but I say that if the Secretary is unable to renew these obligations or to come to an agreement with these nations, which involve the voluntary consent of both debtor and creditor, the country will know it, and the country will decide what they will do about it under those circumstances.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator contend that under the present bill the Secretary would not have the full, unlimited power to extend the payment of this interest for 10 years, if he saw fit, without Congress having any restraining voice whatsoever in the matter?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No; I do not contend that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to say to the Senator that the only thing the Secretary really insisted upon to the last ditch in connection with this whole thing was his power to extend indefinitely the time of payment as his judgment might dictate without any report to Congress for its approval, and undoubtedly I think if the bill should pass now and the Secretary saw fit he could extend the time of payment for 10 years, and Congress would be utterly helpless to prevent that if it did not approve of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, that is the reason why I voted for the Johnson amendment, providing that the arrangements made by the commission with the foreign debtors should not be binding upon the country until Congress approved of them. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the reason why I voted for it; but that proposal was voted down.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know that.

Mr. SIMMONS. The bill as it now stands does not place any restrictions at all upon the power of the Secretary with reference to the extension of time for the payment of interest.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I know that, too; and I am confronted with the fact that these Governments owe us some money and we have their I O U's for it, and we want something more substantial, and something, perhaps, that is negotiable, a more formal kind of agreement; and it is proposed to try to agree with them, if we can, upon what the form of that agreement shall be and what its terms shall be. I do not think we can fix the form of the agreement and compel them to "sign here." It will have to be voluntary. It will have to be the subject of negotiation and discussion and of meeting of the minds and a voluntary agreement to make a contract. It can not be a one-sided contract and it can not be made under duress. If they agree, well and good. I should like to have the proposed agreement only tentative and subject to the ratification of Congress; but the Senate has decided the other way.

I think we shall have to allow the best agreement to be made that it is possible to make. It is very unusual, perhaps, to give to any one set of men—a few men, a governmental commission—this vast power, for it is a vast power; and I regret the necessity of doing it, though not because I distrust the commission or anybody who will be likely to be a member of it, no matter which party is in power. As the Senator from Massachusetts has said, we voluntarily and freely gave the last Secretary of the Treasury great powers. We were compelled to do it. The situation is entirely unusual and novel, and I hope will never occur again in the history of this country; but under the circumstances and in view of the attitude the Senate has taken, I think the best thing we can do now is to leave the matter to this commission.

Of course, I do not think it is any argument to say that anybody who regrets leaving the matter to the commission thereby distrusts the President or the Cabinet or the commission. That is not the point. They do not distrust their integrity. They may not think these great powers should be exercised by the judgment of so few men, and they may distrust their infallibility. I wish some other method could be devised, but I thoroughly realize that the Congress can not negotiate these infinite details. Inasmuch as the Senate has voted that it would not have them submitted for the approval of Congress, I am going to vote for the committee amendment as it stands.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] always addresses himself frankly to a question. He admits that this is an extraordinary power to grant to a commission. He regrets the necessity of it. The question that arises in my mind is, What is the necessity of it? No one has denied that the President of the United States has full power under the Constitution to carry on negotiations leading up to the agreements which the Senator from Connecticut has in mind. The Senator from Connecticut, who possibly is familiar with the subject, says that evidently the Secretary of the Treasury does not know what kind of an agreement he can make with these various debtor nations; that it will require a negotiation to reach agreements. If a contract must be made with these nations, the President, under the Constitution, has the right to carry on the negotiations and make the contract, but only subject to ratification by two-thirds of this body. Is the necessity to get rid of the ratification of this body? Is that the necessity of granting all this extraordinary power to a commission? It requires negotiation. There will probably be a necessity for different agreements with different Governments. Some, so we understand, are able to pay their interest now; others may not be able to pay theirs for several years. But in any event, as the Senator from Connecticut said, it requires negotiations, it requires the ascertainment of facts, it requires the using of discretion after those facts have been ascertained. Is the Senator willing to grant a commission whose membership he does not know to-day and can not know until he has granted them the power—is he willing, I ask, to grant that commission the discretion which is imposed upon him, of determining upon a certain state of facts whether or not this Government should enter into a contract of a certain kind with a foreign Nation? Is he willing to leave to a commission that he does not know the discretion to determine whether or not Great Britain should be allowed 1 year or 10 years, under a given state of facts, to pay the interest on their debt to the United States?

Yet that is what he knows he is doing when he votes for this bill. He is giving up his discretion as a United States Senator, a discretion he must use as a duty of his office, to an unknown commission to determine what shall be done with the state of facts that are not yet known.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, does the Senator agree with the Senator from Nebraska that the President already has the authority, or that the Secretary of the Treasury already has the authority to make these agreements?

Mr. PITTMAN. No; not that the Secretary has the authority to make an agreement. The President of the United States has the authority to ascertain the facts, to negotiate an agreement. He has the right to do that through the Secretary of the Treasury, or through anybody he wants, and when that agreement is negotiated, then, of course, under the Constitution it is reported to the Senate for ratification or confirmation by two-thirds of the Senate.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator is now talking about the necessary constitutional formalities for the ratification of a treaty, I assume?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator think that the debtor and creditor nations can not make any agreement about the evidence of an existing debt except by a treaty?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am not going to discuss whether or not the act under which this money was loaned was constitutional or not constitutional. We treat it as if it were, and there is an existing agreement already under that act, and undoubtedly no other agreement is essential to the carrying out of that act; but I am talking about the necessity of new negotiations, not under that act, and if there must be new negotiations—and the Senator from Connecticut seems to think there must be—and if there must be the ascertainment of facts before you can determine what agreements to make, then I say you can do it through the constitutional power of the President, with the ratification by the Senate, and the only necessity for not doing that that I can see, if there is a necessity, is to prevent the Senate of the United States from having any voice in determining what shall be done with a certain state of facts.

If the commission does negotiate good agreements with these various countries, equitable agreements, based upon the facts, there is no question whatever but that this body would ratify them. A body now which contains a majority of Members who are willing to give the Secretary unlimited authority would certainly ratify any reasonable proposition he brought in here, but if you fear he might bring in a proposition which was not fair, and which this body would not ratify, then such a condition is the strongest argument against granting such authority to him. All of us want to do the fair thing by our debtors and some of us want to do it ourselves.

I state before going further that I do not think Congress has the constitutional power to pass this act. I agree with the argument made against the constitutional authority of Congress to delegate and grant the power provided in this act; but if it did have the constitutional authority, then under the frank statement made by the Senator from Connecticut I would be convinced still in my own mind that the delegation of such an authority to an unknown commission would be a violation of our duties as representatives in this body, and I would not vote for it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut has already spoken once upon this amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Senator from Nevada a question, unless his time has expired.

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Are not almost all commissions which Congress authorizes to be appointed by the President unnamed when they are authorized?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and for that reason we do not give them very much authority.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. We have given the Interstate Commerce Commission great authority, have we not?

Mr. PITTMAN. We have given them great authority, it is true; but, as a matter of fact, every member of that commission was confirmed by this body.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is very true; and I would be perfectly willing to have the members of this commission confirmed by this body.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will state further that, while the Interstate Commerce Commission are given great authority, and in many cases too much authority, their authority is prescribed by the statute adopted by Congress and limited by our Constitution.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I understood the authority of this commission was to be prescribed by the bill we are now considering. I also understood that the members of the commission were to be confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Also, while the Interstate Commerce Commission has great authority, and a great many think it has too much authority, their decisions are subject to strict limitations, and there is appeal, even to the Supreme Court of the United States, from their decisions. There is no appeal from the decisions of this commission it is now proposed to appoint by this bill. An attempt was made to provide an appeal to this body from any decision made by the commission, but Senators not only want to grant this proposed commission absolute power but they do not want even to reserve the right of appeal to this body.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did.

Mr. PITTMAN. But the proposed amendment that the commission should report to Congress has been voted down.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, owing to illness, I have been absent from the Senate during most of the discussion relating to the pending bill. When the measure was first reported, it occurred to me that its objects were proper and that there was necessity for its enactment. Further consideration of the subject, and a reading of the able speech of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], has brought me to the conclusion that there is no reason calling for the passage of the bill now before us. Indeed, Mr. President, I believe that all of this discussion is a work of supererogation and that we could with propriety put aside this bill and address ourselves to important and needed legislation.

It is true that a number of European nations are indebted to the United States for money advanced during and immediately following the war, but it is likewise true that the authority conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury to make these advancements was sufficiently broad and comprehensive to enable him to refund the present outstanding obligations. In other words, large amounts were advanced by the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to loan to various nations an aggregate not exceeding $10,000,000,000 and to purchase at par their obligations therefor, and he was likewise authorized and directed to obtain for the amounts so advanced bonds, or other forms of obligations, of the form and character which the United States was compelled to issue in order to secure from the people of the United States the money which it advanced to the nations referred to.

The law which authorized the loans or advancements is a continuing statute, and the Secretary of War has not exhausted all of the authority and power conferred upon him thereby. It is his duty to obtain from the debtor nations obligations of the character called for by the law authorizing loans, and the law is plain and definite as to the conditions that are to be authorized in the bonds executed by the debtor nations and received by the United States. It has been contended that the Treasury Department was derelict in making advancements without obtaining the form of security which the law contemplated should be given by the debtor nations; but, conceding the justice of this contention, it is patent that the authority still exists with the Treasury Department to obtain from the debtor nations the bonds and securities provided for in the act in question. Why does not the Secretary of the Treasury proceed and obtain the bonds called for by the acts of Congress authorizing the loans? There has been some contention that there is not authority for the Secretary of the Treasury to receive other than cash from the debtor nations for deferred-interest payments.

It seems to me that such a construction of the act authorizing the loan to foreign nations is too narrow and is certainly against the spirit of the law. In my opinion, not only has the Secretary the authority to refund the principal, but it is his duty to press for the collection of the interest. If he has any doubt as to his authority to postpone the payment of interest and put it in the form of bonds, then the subject could be brought to the attention of Congress in the proper manner. However, there is no doubt but that the President would have the right to take up this matter with the debtor nations and negotiate a treaty which met his approval and submit the same to the Senate for ratification or rejection. If existing law does not fully provide for the settlement of all questions growing out of our foreign loans, and if additional agreements are necessary to effectuate satisfactory settlements, then it would seem to be a matter for the executive branch of the Government to consider, rather than the legislative branch of the Government. Undoubtedly the President has the authority, if there are unsettled matters between the United States and the nations who are indebted to it, to enter into negotiations with such nations for the purpose of settling such questions.

Under the Constitution the Executive conducts foreign negotiations. There are unsettled questions between this Government and other Governments. Congress is not charged with the duty of entering into negotiations for the purpose of settling controversies or questions between the United States and other nations. We have ambassadors. The President, through them or through other channels, may take up with other nations all questions that affect the relations between such nations and the United States. If the Treasury Department can not under existing law fully protect the interests of the United States or secure from other nations such obligations evidencing their indebtedness to the United States as it may deem proper, the President of the United States in the exercise of his authority may enter into negotiations for the purpose of adjusting the entire matter. He may make such treaties as he believes proper and then present them to the Senate for their consideration. Undoubtedly there are some small amounts due the United States from European nations which the Secretary of the Treasury would not be authorized to fully settle. For instance, the Grain Corporation obtained obligations from European nations which are the property of the United States. The Secretary of the Treasury does not have authority, as I read the law, to refund this obligation, but undoubtedly the President could by a treaty provide suitable terms of settlement, and upon ratification of the treaty by the Senate the terms of the treaty could be executed.

Mr. President, it seems to me that we are encroaching upon the prerogatives of the President and are seeking by legislation to do something which the President should do. We can not afford to support any measure which denies to the President his constitutional rights and prerogatives. I repeat what I stated at the outset, this measure seems to me to be wholly unnecessary; and it also can be challenged upon the ground that it is unconstitutional.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The question is upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the final vote is taken upon this very important question, I want to say a word to the Senate.

The amendment offered by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] simply provided that this commission of five men to be appointed by the President of the United States to handle this foreign indebtedness was to report its recommendations back to Congress for the approval or disapproval of the representatives of the people of the United States. What is the Congress? It is composed of the lower House, whose Representatives come from every community in the country, and the Senate, with two Senators from each of the sovereign States of the Union.

The proposition submitted by the Senator from California is a very fair one. Who in this body could object to that? Who in the other branch of Congress, who in the country at large, can lodge a valid objection to requiring five men who are handling an indebtedness amounting to nearly $11,000,000,000, a debt due to this Government by foreign countries, to report its recommendations back to Congress? What is it, Mr. President, that causes the Senate to refuse to require this thing to be submitted back to the Congress, composed of the representatives of the American people? There is not a Senator here who can give a valid reason to the intelligent man or woman in this country as to why it should not be done. There is no execuse for the failure to allow Congress to pass upon this tremendous question.

This $11,000,000,000 is due to the Government. The Government belongs to the people and Congress is the people's national legislative body. Then why not require these five men to report to Congress, and before they can make an agreement or settlement that is binding upon this Government secure the approval of the American Congress? Mr. President, the American people should not stand for this thing. There are 500,000 ex-service men out of employment and in distress, and you will not give them adjusted compensation, but the majority party in this body took the tax off the profiteers of the country, and now, as the climax of this sort of work, you are going to take away from the Congress of the United States, the representatives of the American people, the right to say whether or not they approve this settlement that your five men will make.

Do you know what these five men are going to do and are you afraid that Congress would not approve their recommendations?

Mr. President, the people of this country ought to resent and repudiate the action just taken upon this question. I saw the roll call solemnly had this afternoon, and only seven Republican Senators, in a body where you have 24 majority, joined with the Democrats to have the people's Congress pass judgment upon the settlement which is to be suggested by this commission of five men. Ah, Mr. President, I have seen Senators here to-day whose faces have almost grown unfamiliar to me. I do not know where they have been, but they are here now when this refunding bill is to be put through and this strange deal is to be put over. They are here answering to their names and swelling the volume of votes against giving the people's Congress the right to say whether they will accept this settlement made by five commissioners to be appointed by the President.

If Woodrow Wilson had been President and we had had a Democratic Senate and a Democratic House and we had undertaken to put over a deal like this, you would have whispered over there so loud it could have been heard the country over that there was something radically wrong about it. That is what you would have said.

Now, what do you suppose the American people are going to say about this ten or eleven billion dollars when you put it into the power of these men to reduce interest rates or to postpone the payment of principal and interest payments for years and years in the future in order that Wall Street, as I said the other day, may clear the way and come up to collect from these same foreign countries her $5,000,000,000 of indebtedness? You are here to answer to your names to-day when this bloody thing is about to be consummated. Eleven billion dollars owing to this Government by foreign countries, and you put it into the hands of a commission of five men to say we will let Wall Street collect its debts first.

Of course, that is what is going to be done. The time is coming when we ought to talk plainly and let the American people know what is going on here. We ought to let them know so they will have an opportunity this fall to clean up the situation and send men down here who will vote to give their representatives a chance to pass upon a question of such magnitude as this.

Mr. President, I repeat, it is astounding that the Senate will go on record in a solemn roll call to take away from the American Congress the right to pass judgment upon the settlement to be submitted by five men to be appointed by the President. I do not care who they are, whether they are Democrats or Republicans, the American people have a right to have this thing passed upon by their representatives and to say, "We accept it" or "We reject it." Is there anything unfair about that? Is there anything un-American about that? Is there anything improper about that? Not at all; it is fair, it is just, it is right, and yet I saw you vote on a roll call a moment ago to deny to the people of the United States the right to say through their Congress whether they would accept or reject the settlement to be made by your commission of five men.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, before the pending amendment is disposed of, I wish to advert to the colloquy between the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

The Senator from Connecticut referred to the fact that the Congress had repeatedly created commissions and had delegated functions and powers to them. In every one of those cases the commissions were created and directed to proceed to carry out a law. The commission, which is to be created by the pending bill, is to act as in its judgment shall be deemed for the best interests of the United States of America. I undertake to say that if any of the commissions heretofore created by Congress were authorized to act in the premises as they thought was for the best interests of the country, it would have been regarded by the Supreme Court of the United States as an unjustifiable delegation of power. I think that has ordinarily been made the test.

Any one of these commissions can be created for the purpose of determining the existence of a fact; for instance, what is a reasonable rate to be charged, what is an unfair practice, and other things of that kind; but if a commission were turned loose to act in any premises as in its judgment is for the best interests of the country, it would be considered as an unwarranted and unjustifiable delegation of power.

The Congress of the United States is called upon to act as in its judgment is for the best interests of the country, and that power it can not delegate to any commission. That is a further objection to the creation of this commission with any such power.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I merely wish to remark that I, of course, agree that where Congress is creating a commission to perform domestic acts, the Congress, if it attempted to delegate any power to it, must prescribe the rule within which the commission is to act; but this is not a domestic question, except as to one side of it, and we could not come very near to laying down any of the details which necessarily ought to be left to the discretion of the commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with regard to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before with reference to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. FRANCE (when his name was called). Upon this amendment I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. If permitted to vote, I would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). As previously announced, I have a pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. STERLING's name was called). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCORMICK. Making the same announcement as on the last vote as to my pair and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. RANSDELL (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. That Senator is not present, so I withdraw my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 44, as follows:

So Mr. REED's amendment to the amendment of the committee as amended was rejected.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, to add the words which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the committee amendment a comma and the following:

Or, without the consent and approval of Congress, to defer the time of payment of interest in any case beyond three years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Secretary of the Treasury was entirely content with the restrictions proposed to be put upon his powers except the one which provided for the semi-annual payment of interest. The Secretary of the Treasury objected to that upon the sole ground that it would take from him the power to extend the time for the payment of the interest as his judgment might see fit.

The Secretary of Treasury—and I ask attention of Senators on the other side of the Chamber to this statement—stated and reiterated that, in his judgment, there would probably be no request for extension on the part of Great Britain. He said that possibly Great Britain might ask for a year's extension, but not for more than that. However, he said, he thought that France and Italy would probably ask for possibly two or three years' extension. With respect to those three powers he said he did not expect a request for an extension beyond three years; but he said that it might be necessary, in his judgment, to extend the time of payment for the smaller nations which are indebted to us, possibly for some nations as long as 10 years, and he did not wish his power in that respect to be in any way abridged.

Under the amendment which I have now offered, the Secretary of the Treasury, without coming back to Congress, would have authority to extend the time of the payment of interest for as long as three years, but if he proposed to extend it for longer than three years he would have to come back to Congress for its approval. I do not think, Mr. President, there ought to be serious objection to the proposition which I now make. I believe, and I urged in the committee, that some limitation of that character upon the power of the Secretary would aid him in getting a better settlement in the interest of the United States; because if he were permitted to complete the transaction and reach a final settlement, it would be much more acceptable to the Government than to have to come back to Congress. Therefore if we permit him to settle without coming back to Congress by giving an extension of three years, it would be a strong incentive to the debtor nations not to ask for more than three years, because naturally they would, if possible, desire to avoid the matter having to be referred back for the approval of the Congress.

Mr. President, I do not wish to make myself objectionable to the Senate by unnecessarily stressing the importance of some limitation upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the payment of interest. I think it is desired by the people of this country to coerce as much as they can a speedy settlement of these obligations, to the end that we may begin to receive interest upon them. I am very much afraid, if some limitation is not placed upon the power of the Secretary, in view of the purposes expressed by him before the committee, that he will be inclined to grant to the debtor Governments a very much longer extension in the matter of interest payments than will be satisfactory to the people of this country or will be in their interest.

This is the only question about which we had trouble in the committee. I am not the only Senator who insisted upon limitations upon the power of the Secretary of the Treasury. Neither are the Democrats upon the committee the only Senators who insisted upon that limitation. We not only unanimously once agreed upon imposing it, but even after the strenuous insistence of the Secretary of the Treasury, members of the majority of the committee, notably the Senator from Utah, who have voted here to-day for unlimited power on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury in this matter were just as much convinced and argued just as strongly in the cross-examination of the Secretary against conferring upon him this power as I did.

Mr. President, I believe that we ought to require any settlement arrived by the Secretary of the Treasury with respect to the matter all interest to be subject to the limitation which I have suggested. We have imposed limitations in this bill upon practically every other power which the Secretary may exercise. The Secretary of the Treasury first asked that we give him power to exchange these bonds. We have decided that that power ought not to be given him. The Secretary as he first drafted the bill would have been given the power of cancellation. We have decided that he ought not to be given that power. The Secretary of the Treasury did not seriously object to the limitations upon his power in that respect. Why, then, should the Secretary of the Treasury, and why should his partisans and supporters in this body, insist upon his being given unlimited power with respect possibly to the most essential feature in connection with the settlement of this whole question, namely, the time of the payment of the interest?

The Secretary of the Treasury in the bill which he first drafted asked unlimited power with respect to the time of the payment of the principal. We have refused to give him that authority; we have expressly limited his authority in that respect. Now, why is it insisted here that when it comes to the matter of the payment of interest we should grant to him a power which we refused to grant with reference to the exchange of bonds, with reference to cancellation of the debt, or with reference to the time of the payment of the principal?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have listened this afternoon to a curious argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. It is that if we grant to the Secretary of the Treasury unlimited authority to defer interest payments all the debtor nations will pay their interest promptly; but if we say that the Secretary shall not be allowed to defer the interest payments for more than two years our foreign debtors will immediately declare that they want the two years. That is a new kind of argument to me. Of course, everybody who has any sense at all knows that when we come to negotiate for the settlement of the loans made to foreign Governments some time will elapse, and during that period of time every country will understand exactly what every other country is going to obtain. It will be known by Great Britain, a nation which we are told is able to pay its interest, that we propose to extend the time of payment to Czechoslovakia or some other country. If Great Britain is inclined to take advantage of that fact, she will do so, and if she is not inclined to take advantage of that fact, but to play the honorable part of the great nation she is, she will make her agreement to pay us regardless of the fact that some other nation obtained an extension.

We have been told there was no caucus upon this bill. That is a mere caviling at words. I suppose there was no caucus, technically speaking, but there was a conference. "Conferences" are what we always have in the Senate. I waste no time in debating a proposition of that kind. There undoubtedly was a meeting, and a meeting of minds and a concert of action, and that concert of action is being manifested here on the floor to-day. So a question, I repeat, which the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] declared is a great international question, has in that way been made a party question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, a question can not be made a partisan one by the action of one party alone; it takes two to make it a partisan question.

Mr. REED. I understand that, and the Senator from Mississippi is perfectly justified, if he sees fit, in disregarding the action of the Republican caucus and voting on this matter as a great international question. I am not complaining of that at all.

Mr. President, we might as well talk plainly about this matter. When Congress passed the Liberty loan acts it did not leave any discretion of any importance with the Secretary of the Treasury. It provided in good, fixed terms that the obligations received from foreign Governments should be similar in character and terms to the obligations of our own bonds, and we proceeded by acts of Congress to fix the obligations of our own bonds. So we left the Secretary of the Treasury no discretion whatever except that he might advance money to different countries then engaged with the United States in conducting a great war, but upon terms that were written by Congress. Accordingly he made advances; he took written instruments binding these countries to issue their obligations in accordance with the terms of the acts of Congress. That power exists to-day, and the Secretary of the Treasury to-day could take those obligations.

What is the purpose of this bill, however? The purpose of this bill is to wipe out a part of the law as it exists, to nullify it, to destroy it, and to grant a power denied to the former Secretaries of the Treasury, and denied under the law to the present Secretary of the Treasury.

Here is the language:

> That * * * the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act, to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments, and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements—

That is, with foreign Governments—

> shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then and in that event the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extend into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act.

So that as the law now stands the Secretary of the Treasury can make these settlements, but if he makes them he must provide for the payment of the interest as written in the law of the United States. He now desires to be relieved from that obligation of the law. He now desires the authority to settle these obligations of foreign Governments, and to waive the interest for an indefinite period of time. In other words, we are asked now to repeal the sound provision of the law as it now exists, and to do it for the purpose of granting to this representative of Wall Street—who, as I demonstrated the other day, is the second richest man in the United States, and who was the director, I think, of 68 corporations at the time he took his office—the authority to extend indefinitely the interest upon these loans.

We were told the other day by the Senator in charge of this bill that the deferred interest is a small matter. It is only a thousand millions of dollars, equal to one-half of our national debt at the time we entered this war. We talk about it as a trifling matter, but if we want a few millions——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the whole debt of the United States was only a thousand million dollars at the time we entered the war.

Mr. REED. I said one-half; it is equal to the entire debt. I thank the Senator for the correction. If we want a few millions of dollars to improve a river that will result in the reduction of freight rates all over the great Central West, the cheeseparers at the other end of the Avenue tell us we can not have that money, that we must economize, but when we are dealing with foreign countries we talk about a thousand millions of dollars as though it were a trifle. We talk about it as though it were inconsequential. We talk about deferring the interest on ten thousand millions of dollars—aye, eleven thousand millions of dollars—as though it were nothing, and then if we want a few millions of dollars for the highways of this country we are told that we must cut down the expenses of the Government. That is the kind of economy that is being practiced here.

I have no hesitation in prophesying that if we give this authority to the Secretary of the Treasury this great account with foreign Governments will be juggled in the interest of the private bondholders of the United States, those who own the obligations of foreign Governments, and of foreign individuals. That is the reason why this fight is being made as it is being made here; and yet the agricultural bloc, which has been boasting that it has been standing by the people of the United States, in this instance is responding to the crack of the whip, and the handle of the whip is in the clutches of the gentlemen who have been trying to induce us to forgive entirely our foreign debts in order that they may collect their private debts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, in this connection I wish to say that I am surprised and grieved at the failure of the agricultural bloc to block whatever the Senate needs to have blocked that amounts to anything.

This thing of giving a stone where bread is asked is illustrated by the services of the agricultural bloc to agriculture. There is nothing more necessary, Mr. President, than that the soil, the basis of all industry, should be maintained in something like its virgin fertility. Every factory, every mill, every agency of commerce, grows out of it as literally as if it had its roots in the rich knoll; and yet, when an effort was made to preserve the greatest instrumentality for the preservation and the restoration of the soil, we heard a great cock-and-bull story about certain interests, certain patentees in Canada, that were going to be benefited by junking the great nitrate plant in Alabama. Since that time Edison and Ford, or for that matter any other business man who has sense enough to know the value of nitrates, have demonstrated that this was a paying proposition; and to-day, when Ford offers to buy the nitrate plant, we do not hear anything of this strange monopoly up in Canada or somewhere else that had a power plant and two or three mills down in Alabama and was going to absorb the nitrate interests of this country.

The trouble was that the nitrate proposition was fought by the Steel Corporation, it was fought by the great chemical companies, and the agricultural bloc were too wise to block the Steel Corporation; but they did offer a duty of 15 cents a bushel on corn and 30 cents a bushel on wheat, that have been going down ever since the duty was imposed. They might just as well offer the farmer a square foot of smoke or a square mile of hot air. And now, again, the great international bankers make a demand for hundreds of millions of dollars—the jugglery of these bonds, the manipulation of these bonds by the men who know how to handle them like a fakir at a fair knows how to handle 32 cards. That demand is made, which means millions to those who are interested, and does the agricultural bloc block? Not when Wall Street is on the main line and you are liable to derail a golden special! No, sir! They will offer us a duty on hides, or wool, or tanbark, or peanuts.

I do not blame Mr. Mellon. I do not blame the old guard. I do not blame those tried and valiant defenders of special interests, who make no secret of the fact that great property rights should be protected and that the Republican Party should remember its creator in the days of its youth; but I am surprised, I am grieved, to see the agricultural bloc, with its superpartisan piety wrapped like a phylactery around it, bowing in due deference to the demand of Wall Street and again failing to block when blocking would amount to anything to the farmer, whose patron saint it is, if you believe in Santa Claus.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, whenever a man goes out Don Quixoting, he erects a windmill of his own, attacks it, and entirely overcomes it, and then goes home and brags about the result. I said nothing about giving charity to Europe. If I had said anything, I would not be amenable to any criticism. The American Government does not give charity to Europe. The American people give it every day, and I hope in the name of God that the time will never come when they cease to give it as long as it is needed.

The Senator undertakes to repeat to me, of all men—he of all men and I of all men—the eternal platitude that justice must precede generosity. That is true; there can be no justice without generosity, because if you do an injustice you are ungenerous to the person to whom you do it, of course; but, at the same time, there can be no justice without generosity; there can be no justice without mercy; and when the Senator talks about this as a money lender's proposition, where certain people owe us certain moneys which they must pay, principal and interest, nolens volens, I would like to inform him of two facts: First, they are sovereign powers themselves. They can repudiate their debts any morning they get ready. No international law has ever given the right to proceed to war in order to make a repudiating nation pay its debts. I would like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that 17 American States, in the history of this country, repudiated their debts, and European creditors settled it.

When you proceed with this legislation as if nobody were interested in it except the United States, you are proceeding upon the theory that it does not take two people to make a contract, which is absurd. You think you can draw up anything you please and put it in an American statute and bind all Europe by it. That is absurd. You can not reach any conclusion of present difficulties except by an agreement between ourselves and the other nations. Whether the difference between us be a difference of debtor and creditor, or whether it be something else, internationally speaking, the only remedy between nations is war, and if you announce beforehand that foreign nations have to do this and have to do that and have to do the other thing, that means that if they do not do it you are going to make them do it, and you have no court to appeal to, and you have no way to make them do it except by artillery and cavalry and infantry.

This question should never have been brought up. If I had been President of the United States, I never would have sent it here; I never would have sent the Secretary of the Treasury here to present such a matter. I would have gone along and dealt with these various debtor nations one by one, because each one of them stands upon a different footing from the others, and I would have brought back my agreements with them, and I would have submitted those agreements to the Senate of the United States, or to the Congress of the United States, if an appropriation had been required, or if a law had been required to change an ancient law, because the Executive by treaty can not do those two things. It can not appropriate money and it can not violate a law.

Mr. President, the Senator thinks that because I have said this ought not to be a money lender's proposition, therefore I am a quixotic sort of wild-haired gentleman who wants the United States to give away to somebody everything it has. I never said that. The great powers of this earth cherish their honor as much as we do ours. The question is not whether the great powers will pay their debts; it is a question as to how lenient we are going to be toward suffering debtors—small powers. An attempt has been made in this bill to fix it so that you can not even negotiate with them. It is fixed so that they can not even exchange the bonds of people whose bonds we would rather have for others.

Mr. President, there is poor little Serbia, which received an ultimatum. The Senator said we won the war. We did not. The whole civilized world put together won the war, and I am tired of this miserable American brag about our winning the war. It is not true, it is not chivalrous, it is not generous, and it is not nice to say it. France lost a million and a half men, Great Britain lost three-quarters of a million, little Belgium lost nearly a quarter of a million, little Serbia lost over a third of a million before we came in and put up mainly our dollars. Our dollars!

We lost 50,000 men, I believe. Do you think that because we lost a few dollars Serbia and Belgium have not a right to put against those few dollars the hundreds of thousands of men who lost their lives, leaving widows and children behind them? Do you remember that when we fought for the world civilization and its democracy we were nearly three years getting in, and in the meanwhile they had been having their lands torn up, their houses burned down, devastation of every industry in the world, the schools stopped, the churches closed, lives lost, widows created, orphans created, all this time?

Ah, Mr. President, I am an American. I am an ambassador from a sovereign American State, but I am ashamed and tired of this constant talk about our winning the war. We did our part; we did it nobly; we did it superbly; but it is my opinion that Germany would have been whipped anyhow. It would have taken longer.

Whether that be true or not, the others did as much as we did, if not more. France did a thousand times as much. Great Britain did several times as much. So many of you hate her very name, that I will not try to put it in numbers. Italy did more than we did. Belgium did infinitely more. Serbia did infinitely more to win the war than we did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has already spoken once upon this amendment.

Mr. ASHURST. I just wished to inquire if I have any time on the bill, and if so, if I have a right to speak at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not at this time.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I have not spoken on the bill and I spoke less than 10 minutes on the amendment. So I wish to speak about 5 minutes longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that no Senator shall speak more than once upon an amendment. Under the ruling heretofore made the Senator can not speak upon the bill while an amendment is pending. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Nebraska if he has spoken before on the pending amendment?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not, but I am just informed that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] would like to arrange to have a recess taken. I yield to him for the purpose of submitting his request.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, allow me to make a statement, not upon an amendment, but upon the order of business. A request has come to me from the other side of the Chamber that we take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning, with the understanding that at not later than 2 o'clock to-morrow all debate shall cease and we shall vote upon any amendment that may be pending and upon the bill without further debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to agree to that, because I realize the amendment which I have to offer will come as the last thing and there would then be no opportunity to explain it. I wish to discuss it a little.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. SIMMONS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I did not intend to yield the floor except for the purpose of allowing the Senator from North Dakota to submit his request. I have a word or two to say upon the pending amendment.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] assumes in the first place that the United States is without existing contracts with these countries. The fact is that under existing law the United Stats did enter into written contracts with all of these countries and that those contracts embrace all but six or seven hundred million dollars of the indebtedness. These contracts are definite and certain. They provide for the payment of a certain sum of money at a certain rate of interest, and being due on demand the power rests solely within the United States as to the making of the demand. They are demand obligations. Therefore it is not a question as to whether it takes two to make a bargain. The bargain has already been made, and it has been made under the authority of the United States legislative power and exists at the present day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will not put me in the position of being ignorant of the fact that there was an agrement between the foreign Governments and our own.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not attempting to do anything with the Senator except that I desire to say that when he stated it took two to make a bargain——

Mr. WILLIAMS. It takes two to modify a bargain, too.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And that therefore we must create this commission to do that he took a line of argument that is entirely unnecessary.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I decline to yield further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It takes two to make a bargain, and the Senator desires to modify an old bargain.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator really abandoned his case when he said that the President already had the power to modify the existing agreement and submit it to the Congress of the United States or to the Senate for acceptance.

The question is not whether we are going to recognize the equities of Serbia or the equities of Belgium or the equities of France. The question is not whether we are going to respond to a reasonable degree of generosity, but the simple question is whether that act of generosity, that act of liberality, is to be done by the Congress of the United States representing the people, or whether that enormous power is to be vested in the hands of a few men to be appointed by the President of the United States.

That raises the question whether we have here a Republic. Is this a Republic in which the representatives of the people are to possess the power to give away the people's money, to exercise generosity, or have we an autocratic form of government in which the Congress is divested of that great power and it is placed in the hands of a few people?

Why, Mr. President, the prime minister of France himself would not venture to abate any of the reparations due from Germany to France without consulting his Chamber of Deputies. Time and again when propositions have been made to him to do that, he has gone to his Chamber of Deputies to get the authority of the chamber representing the people of France.

Yet it is proposed here in the United States that Congress shall vest that great power in the hands of a commission, not selected by Congress but selected by the President, and that commission is to exercise this enormous power over an interest amounting to $500,000,000 a year, one-half as much as Congress has heretofore expended annually.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, just a question——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator is not unmindful of the fact that the principal function of Congress these days is to act as a conduit to convey power from the people to some bureau. We are governed by bureaus entirely. Why should we not follow that course in this case?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I take the position that the Congress of the United States ought to exercise its responsibility and its power. If it is necessary to be generous, let Congress be generous. We are responsible to the people. If we make a mistake they will hold us accountable for it. But we have not any right to divest ourselves of that power and abrogate that power and relieve ourselves of the duty by turning it over to a little commission, a commission which would have the power to delay the payment of $500,000,000 a year for 20 years, if it pleased, a commission which would have greater power over the finances of the United States than Congress has over the finances of the United States.

I therefore say to the Senator from Mississippi that it is not a question whether we shall be generous or not, it is not a question whether we shall be overexacting or not. It is a question whether we are going to abrogate the power and turn it over to a little commission of men and say we relieve ourselves of the responsibility. I do not care whether the commission acts wisely or unwisely, whether it is overgenerous or overniggardly. We have not any right to put that power in the hands of any commission if this is still a republic and the power still remains in the hands of the representatives of the people.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I know that the Senate is anxious for a vote, but I know also that it is impossible to get a vote to-night at any reasonable hour. That has been indicated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], and it is evident from amendments which are yet to be offered. If we are to remain here until those amendments can be disposed of, there is no use to hasten in any way whatsoever; we can take our time. If that is the program I think the Senate may very well listen to some cogent remarks upon the subject.

Mr. President, this matter has been discussed in the main purely upon the assumption that the Government of the United States has an intangible thing here with which it is dealing, that it has something which neither has earmark, boundary, terms, nor conditions, a mere I O U. I wish, in all earnestness, to call to the attention of the Senate precisely the situation in which the Government stands at this hour. We never loaned a dollar to Great Britain or France. I reiterate that in the common acceptation of the terms, we never loaned a dollar to either one of our allies. What this Government of ours was authorized to do, and what it did, was to buy the obligations of those Governments, an entirely different thing from the making of a mere loan and the taking back of an I O U. I desire to call attention to the law upon that subject:

Section 2 of the act provided—that we should go out and loan money? Not at all. It provided—

That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States—

Now, to do what?

to purchase at par from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act.

That is what the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to do. He was authorized to buy the obligations of those countries at par.

Mr. President, at this point I wish to insert as a part of my remarks, without reading, the entire section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

The section referred to is as follows:

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and prosecuting the war by establishing credits in the United States for foreign Governments, the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, is hereby authorized, on behalf of the United States, to purchase at par, from such foreign Governments then engaged in war with the enemies of the United States, their obligations hereafter issued, bearing the same rate of interest and containing in their essentials the same terms and conditions as those of the United States issued under authority of this act, to enter into such arrangements as may be necessary or desirable for establishing such credits and for purchasing such obligations of foreign Governments and for the subsequent payment thereof before maturity, but such arrangements shall provide that if any of the bonds of the United States issued and used for the purchase of such foreign obligations shall thereafter be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 3½ per cent per annum under the provisions of section 5 of this act, then, and in that event, the obligations of such foreign Governments held by the United States shall be, by such foreign Governments, converted in like manner and extent into obligations bearing the same rate of interest as the bonds of the United States issued under the provisions of section 5 of this act. For the purposes of this section there is appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $3,000,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the authority granted by this section to the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase bonds from foreign Governments as aforesaid shall cease upon the termination of the war between the United States and the Imperial German Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. What sort of obligation did the United States buy? It was not a mere I O U for the mere lending of money, but under this law they purchased at par certain obligations of those various Governments. It has been read here time and again, but I can not believe that it has received due consideration from the Senate. What were those obligations which were bought at par and which were authorized to be so bought? I submit that no more solemn obligation could be entered into than was entered into between these Governments when this Government of ours bought at par the obligations of those foreign Governments.

Here is the obligation which was bought from Great Britain and which is a mere sample of those which were bought from other countries:

The Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of ———, on demand, with interest from the date hereof at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

That was not all the obligation. The obligation continues:

Such principal sum and the interest thereon will be paid at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York or, at the option of the holder, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington in gold coin of the United States of America.

That was not all the obligation. I read further:

This certificate will be converted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, at par, with an adjustment of accrued interest, into an equal par amount of 5 per cent convertible gold bonds of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland conforming to the provisions of acts of Congress of the United States known respectively as second Liberty bond act, third Liberty bond act, and fourth Liberty bond act.

I ask that the whole of the obligation may be inserted in my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The document referred to is as follows:

SECTION 6.

(Form of certificate or obligation taken from all foreign Governments.)

CERTIFICATE OF INDEBTEDNESS—SIXTH SERIES.

The Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for value received, promises to pay to the United States of America, or assigns, the sum of ——— on demand, with interest from the date hereof, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum. Such principal sum and the interest thereon will be paid at the Subtreasury of the United States in New York or, at the option of the holder, at the Treasury of the United States in Washington in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness, or, at the option of the holder, at the Bank of England, London, England, in pounds sterling at the fixed rate of $4.76⅞ to the pound sterling, and at any such place of payment without deduction for any British taxes, present or future.

This certificate will be converted by the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, if requested by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States of America, at par, with an adjustment of accrued interest, into an equal par amount of 5 per cent convertible gold bonds of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland conforming to the provisions of acts of Congress of the United States known respectively as second Liberty bond act, third Liberty bond act, and fourth Liberty bond act. If bonds of the United States issued under authority of said acts shall be converted into other bonds of the United States bearing a higher rate of interest than 4½ per cent per annum, a proportionate part of the obligations of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of this series acquired by the United States under authority of said acts shall, at the request of said Secretary of the Treasury, be converted into obligations of said Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland bearing interest at a rate exceeding that previously borne by this obligation by the same amount as the interest rate of the bonds of the United States issued upon such conversion exceeds the interest rate of 4½ per cent but not less than the highest rate of interest borne by such bonds of the United States.

———, ———,
For the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Dated, this — day of ———, 1918.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. There is your law. There is your obligation. What are we doing with it now? What is it proposed that we shall do now? It is proposed that we shall surrender and modify the obligation which we bought under existing law and which we bought at par.

There is not a single one of those obligors who has yet appeared before the United States and asked for a modification of those obligations. When the Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Senate Finance Committee I asked him that question, whether any Government had applied for a modification of its obligation, and he said no. I asked him if he had taken up negotiations with any one of them, and he said no. So we have this situation: We have the law expressly authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase at par certain obligations of these foreign Governments. The foreign Governments presented the obligations; they were obligations to pay so much money with 5 per cent interest; and, at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, to convert those obligations into other long-term bonds.

Mr. President, I can not see why this matter is brought up here at this time unless there be some sinister purpose which is not manifest from any of the record in the case. When we have already bought the obligations of these countries, when they have given their solemn promise to pay so much money and to enter into other obligations specifically provided for in the ones which we now hold, I should like to know why there is such a demand here now to modify this contract? I am not willing to enter into the realm of prophecy, because I submit that the burden is upon those who are pressing this bill to show why it should be done. It is for them to give a reason. It is not for us to surmise and speculate as to why it is done; but the law authorized the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to use the gold dollars collected from the people of this country for the specific purpose of buying obligations of foreign countries. He bought those obligations at par upon their face; they bear 5 per cent interest; not one of these Governments has applied for a modification.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, it must be apparent to all Senators that a conclusion of this matter can not be reached this evening. It is now 6.20 o'clock. Under the peculiar conditions which exist, I think the Senate ought to take a recess until some time to-morrow. Some of us have waited very patiently for the Senator from North Dakota, in charge of the bill, to indicate a purpose to do that. For my part, if I thought that a vote could be reached within a few minutes, I would be perfectly willing to remain here, but I can not understand why we should be expected to remain here indefinitely under the circumstances as they exist. I therefore move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow, if that hour is acceptable to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Arkansas to withhold that motion for the time being. I think, perhaps, all the argument has been made that it is desired to make upon the particular amendment which is now pending and that we can now have a vote upon it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield further to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield for a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me say further to the Senator that there are some Senators—I do not know how many—who came back from their homes in order to vote upon this matter to-day, and they have to leave again to-morrow. They are very anxious to have a vote to-day. I tried to fix some time to-morrow when a vote could be taken. I myself have an engagement at 3 o'clock to-morrow, but, of course, if it is absolutely necessary, I shall have to break that engagement; that is all there is to it.

Now let me ask the Senator if he will not consent that we now vote upon the pending amendment, and then have a short executive session, at its conclusion taking a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am advised by a number of Senators about me that they expect to speak on the pending amendment. I can not understand why it is necessary now to press this amendment to a vote and to leave other amendments undisposed of. The Senate can easily finish the bill within a reasonable limit of time to-morrow. I, therefore, move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow. [Putting the question.] The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. COLT (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. McKELLAR (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], but, under my arrangement with him, I feel at liberty to vote on this question, and vote "yea."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). Let me inquire if the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a general pair with that Senator which I transfer to the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 44, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Ashurst	Heflin	Overman	Simmons
Borah	Hitchcock	Pittman	Stanley
Broussard	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Swanson
Caraway	King	Ransdell	Underwood
Dial	La Follette	Reed	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	McKellar	Robinson	Walsh, Mont.
Harris	Myers	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Harrison	Norris	Shields	Williams

NAYS—44.

Ball	Fernald	McCormick	Phipps
Brandegee	France	McCumber	Poindexter
Bursum	Frelinghuysen	McKinley	Spencer
Cameron	Gooding	McLean	Sterling
Capper	Hale	McNary	Sutherland
Colt	Jones, Wash.	Moses	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Nelson	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Kenyon	Nicholson	Warren
Edge	Keyes	Oddie	Watson, Ind.
Elkins	Lenroot	Page	Weller
Ernst	Lodge	Pepper	Willis

NOT VOTING—20.

Calder	Gerry	Ladd	Shortridge
Crow	Glass	New	Smith
Culberson	Harreld	Newberry	Smoot
Cummins	Johnson	Norbeck	Stanfield
du Pont	Kendrick	Owen	Trammell

So the Senate refused to take a recess.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is evident that Senators generally do not wish to bring this matter to a final vote to-day. I deprecate the attempt to take the matter into the hands of either side of the Chamber, as we are trying to do the best we can to get a vote as soon as it is possible and to accommodate everyone. That was the idea in entering into the agreement which was reached on Saturday last.

Mr. President, it is desired to hold a brief executive session for the purpose of making some reports, and then I shall move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock. I desire to give notice that I intend to press the matter to-morrow to a final vote.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. Before yielding I move that when the Senate concludes its business on this calendar day it take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have a vote on my motion.

Mr. REED. I merely wish to ask the Senator a question. I presume, then, that those of us who do not stay here for the executive session may go home with the understanding that, with the exception of executive business, there will be no business transacted?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Dakota that when the Senate concludes its session this afternoon it take a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.), under the order previously made, the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 31, 1922, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, speak. We are waiting for Thy gracious spirit and longing for Thy voice to cheer. We ask for fuller light, deeper love, and greater faith.

Our city is smitten, impoverished, and hushed by the hand of death—a calamity too awful for words. We draw back with trembling. Yet may we be chastened and moved with generous pity and led to the deepest reflection. O remember those who are in the desolation of their grief, like prisoners in a barren dungeon. Hear the mother in her anguish, be with the father in his unspoken heartbreak, and console all hearts that are so full that their cries can not be uttered. O forgive our delays. With us things are so partial, obscure, and uncertain. We see through a glass darkly and sometimes lose our way. But as the days pass by and the night fast approaches we would see Him who took the scourge, the spear, and the cross that all troubled hearts might have peace and eternal rest. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, January 28, 1922, was read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a 30 days' leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. SPROUL, whose nephew was killed in the Knickerbocker Theater disaster on Saturday night last.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, as far as I know my colleague, Mr. SMITHWICK, of Florida, was the only Member of the House who was in the Knickerbocker Theater at the time of the accident Saturday night. He is quite severely injured, and I ask unanimous consent for an indefinite leave of absence for him on account of that fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. CRISP, for to-day and to-morrow, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks upon the Air Mail Service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE KNICKERBOCKER THEATER DISASTER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we have all been very greatly shocked and saddened by the frightful catastrophe which occurred at the Knickerbocker Theater in this city on Saturday evening last. We are all anxious to do everything that we can to relieve the injured, to aid and comfort those who mourn the loss of friends, and to prevent, if possible, recurrence of like catastrophes.

A number of gentleman have asked me whether the House would order an investigation. I have suggested to them that inasmuch as under the law there must be a thorough investigation, or should be by the coroner's jury, and inasmuch as the District Commissioners have given notice that they intend to make a thorough investigation of the matter, and the District engineer commissioner has given notice that he intends to very thoroughly investigate the question of the character of the building, it would not, in my opinion, be wise for the Congress to begin an investigation until these official bodies directly responsible shall have undertaken and concluded the investigations they are proposing to make. In the meantime, from conversation with the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia [Mr. FOCHT], as well as other members of that committee, it is my understanding that the District Committee is proposing to keep closely in touch with the investigations that are to be made, and if at any time it seems proper and wise for that committee to take up the matter and investigate it on its own account it will do so. Until the District Committee shall have concluded that it is wise and proper that an investigation should be undertaken by Congress, I imagine nothing in that direction will be undertaken by this body.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The doors were closed and the Sergeant at Arms was directed to notify absentees.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 303 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE FORMER REPRESENTATIVE BARCHFELD.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Speaker, in the great catastrophe which befell this city on Saturday evening ex-Representative A. J. Barchfeld, a former Member of this body, who long represented an important industrial district in Pennsylvania, lost his life. I am sure that I but reflect the sentiments of the great number of friends who long knew him when I say that we deplore the loss of that life in its full, rounded manhood, with many years of usefulness in prospect to his State and to his country, and the Members and friends who knew him bow in deep regret, and we extend the profoundest sympathy to the members of his family.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. WOOD of Indiana, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the independent offices appropriation bill (H. R. 9981), with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. When the House adjourned on Saturday there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], to which a point of order was reserved by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. BLACK. I ask that the point of order be passed upon, and I make the point of order that the gentleman from Indiana has not stated the ground for his point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana will please state his ground.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserved a point of order on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas on Saturday evening because of the fact that we were on the point of adjourning, and I really did not understand the purport of it. Having read the amendment, I am now inclined to think that it is in order; so I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana withdraws his point of order.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be reported in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK: Page 28, line 25, after the word "available," strike out the period and insert: "Provided, That no claim shall be paid out of the amount appropriated herein unless the Shipping Board shall find that such claim grew out of an agreement, expressed or implied, entered into with the United States Shipping Board or the Emergency Fleet Corporation or their legal representatives.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, at the very outset I want to say——

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will say to the gentleman that as far as I am concerned I have no objection to this amendment.

Mr. BLACK. Very well. I shall not take up any of the time of the House in making an argument in support of an amendment which the chairman of the committee has agreed to accept.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has offered an amendment, which, without objection, the Clerk will again report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 28, line 25, add a new paragraph to read as follows:

"No part of the funds appropriated or made available in this act for the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be expended for the preparation, printing, publication, or distribution of any bulletin, newspaper, magazine, journal, or other periodical, or for services in connection therewith, not including, however, the preparation and printing of documents and reports authorized or required to be issued by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The parliamentary clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] has sent to the desk a preferential amendment. Does the gentleman desire to have that considered?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Yes; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The preferential amendment will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee: On page 28, line 24, after the word "adjustment," strike out the figures "$50,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$25,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] is recognized.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, if that amendment should prevail and if I should be recognized for the purpose I would then offer an amendment to reduce the $30,000,000 available to $15,000,000. My purpose in offering this amendment is this. As Chairman Lasker himself fully explained in the hearing and as was explained to those who were present during the discussion on Saturday, this appropriation of $50,000,000 is not intended for the settlement of all the pending claims against the Shipping Board aggregating $219,000,000, because it is not intended to liquidate the $63,000,000 of claims that are pending in the Court of Claims or the $55,000,000 that are pending in the admiralty courts. This, as explained by Mr. Lasker in the hearings on page 907, leaves a balance of $100,000,000 of claims presented by claimants who did not have sufficient faith in the validity or correctness of their claims to go into the Court of Claims or the admiralty court. Mr. Lasker himself describes these claims which he asks permission to settle, as follows:

We found awaiting us what are the dregs of the claims.

In discussing these very claims at the hearings on this bill, Chairman Lasker further stated:

It is well known that a man or concern, in making a claim against the Government, adds in everything anybody else owes him and everything he owes anybody else. When that is all added up, he adds in the date for good measure; then when he gets through with that he multiplies it by six, or whatever number occurs to him, and then you have his claim.

Now this $50,000,000 would settle all of these claims upon the basis of 50 cents on the dollar. As it was explained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] on Saturday, the War Department under authorization and appropriations made for the settlement of claims against the Government have settled those claims on a basis of 14 cents on the dollar of the amount of the claims. The Shipping Board itself has already adjusted and settled a large number of claims. They have settled more than 70 of the wooden-ship claims alone, and they have settled a number of others, and have made awards which have not been paid on still a number of others. All of those they have settled they have settled on the basis of about 25 cents on the dollar. They were claims about which there was no question as to liability, and were not "the dregs of the claims," as these are, as explained by Mr. Lasker. Consequently, in view of the fact that it is a most extraordinary procedure, authorizing a commission—not of jurists or lawyers, but of laymen with one exception—to adjudicate those claims that involve technical legal questions as well as questions of fact, and in view of the fact that we are giving them that extraordinary power instead of requiring "these dregs of claims" to assert their alleged rights in the courts, as two-thirds of the claimants have already done, we should certainly not give authority and an appropriation to pay that character of claims at 50 cents on the dollar.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I object. This whole matter was thrashed out Saturday, and there is not a kernel left in the straw, and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the "noes" appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee) there were—ayes 33, noes 53.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized in support of his amendment. Does he desire to have it again reported?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take the time of the committee except to say this is practically the same provision that has been carried, I think, in the sundry civil bill for the past two or three years—two years at least—and it seeks to preclude the publication of magazines and newspapers which in past times was indulged in by the Shipping Board to a great extent during the life of its activity. It will not in any way prevent the advertising in newspapers or magazines, but would simply prevent the Shipping Board from setting up a bureau or department down there with editors and copy writers such as they have had before this provision was carried in the bill.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to this amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

No part of the sums appropriated in this act shall be used to pay the compensation of any attorney, regular or special, for the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation unless the contract of employment has been approved by the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 29, line 6, after the word "States," insert the following: "And in no event shall more than $350,000 of sums appropriated by this act be expended as compensation for such attorneys, regular or special.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order, and in making the point of order I wish to state that this same amendment was introduced by the gentleman once before.

Mr. JONES of Texas. No.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, if it is not, wherein is the difference?

Mr. JONES of Texas. This amendment allows $350,000 and the other was for $250,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the testimony that they have 80 lawyers in the Shipping Board and Emergency Fleet Corporation. The testimony shows that there are 78, but here is the list of 80, 40 on page 1116 and 40 on page 1117, which costs $650,000. I suppose 2 of them ran around so much they could not count them. I heard a story in the far West of a defendant who had four lawyers. The judge asked him if he had counsel. He said, "Yes," and in fact that he "would like to trade one of his lawyers for a good witness." I think they have too many lawyers. I am not sure that the limitation ought to be such as it is on all the lawyers. I am not sure they could not have paid more for some two or three lawyers, but I believe a business man could take the claims they have, employ 20 good lawyers, 20 good claim agents, 20 good law clerks, secure them all for not more than $350,000, and do this work and do it just as well as by all these high-priced lawyers. They have an average of $8,000 apiece for all of these men who are listed here.

I call attention to this fact: There are still five months to run of the present appropriation. There are $650,000 of this year's appropriation, and that has five months to run. It seems to me if these lawyers get down to their knitting and try to dispose of these matters, they ought to be able with the $650,000 appropriation for this year, which has five months to run, and then $350,000 for next year, on these claims, from what has already developed, to be able to dispose of these matters; at least the claims should be reduced by July 1 so that some of the lawyers could be dispensed with. It is not necessary to hire high-priced lawyers altogether. Reference was made here the other day to a firm of lawyers with 40 in the firm. I will venture the assertion that if you will look over the list they do not average over $3,000 apiece outside of the members of the firm. There is a firm of lawyers in the Southwest with three men who are at the head of the firm making some $50,000 apiece. They have some 25 lawyers in the firm. The average price they pay those 25 lawyers is $3,000 apiece. They have one who is working for $3,500, who the Federal district judge of that district says is one of the best lawyers who has ever appeared in his court. He had been working for eight years at that time and was drawing $3,500 per year. He has not the art of publicity and of getting his services before the public. But if you go out and look at an organization of lawyers you very soon find out who are the real lawyers. You can pay a few of them good salaries and have them supervise the work. In his testimony Mr. Schlesinger says that he is not sure that a lot of this work can not be done by law clerks and by claim agents. In different concerns of the country a lot of the work, the details, the investigation, and the determining of the merits of the cases are attended by law clerks and claim agents. It does not require a lawyer to determine whether a case has merit. All they need him for is to determine the legal liability and have him try the cases.

It seems to me if you take the $350,000, with what we have for the five months of this year, they could do all the work that needs to be done, or they could change the system, as I suggested a while ago, and employ 20 or 30 good lawyers and the balance in law clerks and claim agents. That looks feasible and reasonable. I think they ought to have plenty of funds to really do the work, but none to waste. I think with that limitation they could really do the work. They have 80 lawyers already arranged for until July 1. With the adoption of my amendment they could retain 50 of them under their present plan or could change the plan as before suggested.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I do not and I hope no Member of Congress wishes to hamper or hinder the work of the Shipping Board. We are anxious to see our flag upon every sea and our merchant marine a success, but we are also interested, and the people of this country are interested, in the manner in which their money is being expended by the Shipping Board.

Now, I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], that probably the best thing the Shipping Board has done was to get some real experts to attend to the operation of our fleets. But I do believe there is more or less duplication or overlapping of duties as between the Shipping Board with its five bureaus and the duties of the various bureaus or division of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

For instance, there is a Bureau of Law in the Shipping Board, about which my good friend from Iowa seemed to get a little excited the other day. The legal department of the Shipping Board has 14 lawyers instead of 2 or 3, as he suggested. What are their duties? They study the laws of foreign Governments and attend a few hearings before the Shipping Board. I believe you can get a $20,000 lawyer, if it takes a very high-priced lawyer, or even a $10,000 lawyer, and I want to say that this country is not alive with $10,000 lawyers—I mean lawyers whose services are worth ten thousand annually—to do that work within the course of the year, without the expenditure of $37,000 or $47,000 for a Bureau of Law and such a large legal department in the Shipping Board. I do not think so large an amount for a Bureau of Law and legal department of the Shipping Board is justified in the light of the fact that the legal divison of the Emergency Fleet Corporaton has employed some 60 or 70 lawyers who might be used by the Shipping Board.

I do not understand the process of reasoning on the part of your leadership nor your ideas of economy when you permit the Shipping Board to spend $8,200,000 to recondition the Leviathan and sell her for $6,000,000, and yet, I am informed, your leaders propose to spend only about $13,000,000 for the improvement and maintenance of all the rivers and harbors of the whole Nation. I do not mean improvement, because there can not be improvement nor even maintenance for so small an amount.

I notice from the hearings here that certain sums of money are to be expended by the Shipping Board proper, in addition to the amounts estimated for five bureaus in the Shipping Board, separate and apart from the Fleet Corporation.

You, of course, understand that the Shipping Board acts only in an advisory capacity, having reserved to itself the right to review and veto the acts of the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

Under this bill you are turning over to the Shipping Board large lump-sum appropriations, to be expended as they see fit, with no strings as to any activity. I find on page 867 of the hearings a list of small estimates, the first of which is for $1,500 to spend for subsistence, for whom or why or where I do not know, nor do the hearings show. For furniture, $5,000. With all the furniture we have distributed around in these various surplus office buildings in Washington, I can not conceive any reason for spending that much money for furniture for the board. It is true these are small amounts, but small amounts make up the large amounts, and we should look after the small items also in this legislation. I notice another item, for newspapers, $1,400. The board is proposing to spend $1,700,000 for advertising in the next year. What necessitates this expenditure of $1,400 for newspapers? Miscellaneous services, $7,000. What sort of services, and who will perform these miscellaneous services? I notice also books and periodicals, $2,500. What sort of books and what branch of the service needs them? I see here an item, miscellaneous supplies, $3,000. What sort of supplies, and for whom? It occurs to me that the committee should know why these items are asked for and if they are essential to the operation of the Shipping Board.

I want to call the chairman's attention to another matter upon which I am sure the committee would like a little information.

I notice the Emergency Fleet Corporation is a member of a great insurance pool, and every month the Emergency Fleet Corporation contributes $250,000 to that pool. The chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Indiana, very properly asked how much the United States Government was getting out of this, but his question was never answered. You may learn this from the hearings, and I am satisfied the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON] is aware of it, and I call upon him to tell this committee how much goes back to the Government or the Emergency Fleet Corporation of that $3,000,000 which is put into that great insurance pool in the course of a year. Here is $1,000,000 every four months going into an insurance pool, the American Steamship Owners' Mutual Protection and Indemnity Association (Inc.), which is comprised of the shipping organizations throughout this country, and yet we do not know what benefit the Emergency Fleet Corporation or the Shipping Board has ever derived from that insurance pool.

The hearings also disclose the fact that within the organization of the Shipping Board there is a Bureau of Construction to be maintained, at a cost of $20,360, with one expert who draws a salary of $9,000. This bureau does no constructing whatsoever, and in answer to a question propounded by Mr. Wood, Mr. Lasker said the duties of this bureau involve the study of construction. My suggestion to the committee is that with 1,300 idle ships a study of construction may be necessary in the future, but is certainly not necessary now. Aside from this it is my judgment that whatever study of construction necessary in the operation of our merchant marine may well be done by that division of the Emergency Fleet Corporation which has to do with the actual construction of ships.

I realize, gentlemen of the committee, that the Shipping Board is confronted with many difficult problems, and we must be patient and as helpful as possible in our consideration of this great enterprise. No one is more anxious than I am to cooperate with my best efforts for the ultimate success of an American merchant marine, yet upon reading the hearings such items as those I have mentioned above struck me as being unnecessary and possibly an expenditure of public moneys which could be avoided and at the same time not interfere with the orderly processes of the Shipping Board.

This is, or at least it should be, a day of economy on the part of those who have the power to appropriate the public money from the Treasury. Many charges have been made about the waste and extravagance of the Shipping Board. True, it has become popular pastime in this House to condemn the board. I am not indulging in this pastime, yet if the exercise of caution in appropriating money during these times of depression and financial distress for any department of the Government could become more of a pastime in this House those who bear the burdens of Government would be much better off.

In this bill you are carrying an appropriation of $100,459,000, of which nearly one-half million is to be used for the Shipping Board alone for administrative purposes and fifty millions for the use of the Emergency Fleet Corporation in actually operating the fleet and fifty millions for the payment of claims. You appropriated last August some forty-eight millions, at which time the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] had much to say on this floor derogatory to the Shipping Board. These are very large amounts of money and I want to feel that we are accomplishing something, and not one penny of it should be expended unless there is absolute necessity for such expenditure.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. MCDUFFIE] has said that he did not understand the course of reasoning by which the committee proposed to spend $8,000,000 in reconditioning the Leviathan and then subsequently selling it for $6,000,000. I would have thought he would have fully understood from the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] when that matter was under discussion. The gentleman from Indiana said, after making some remarks directly with refernce to myself, that it was easy for a demagogue and those who were talking back to their districts to criticize some of the practices of the Shipping Board or some of their proposals.

Mr. Chairman, I did not offer the amendment with reference to the Leviathan. If there had been any credit in connection with it, it would not have been mine had it been adopted. I did not expect at the time I made my remarks with reference to the reconditioning of that ship that any of my sayings would go back to my district, much less did I expect anybody to impugn my motives. I do expect, however, to hear in the next election from those taking the platform for the Democratic Party some reference to the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana. When gentlemen rise here in good faith and desire to cut out some of these expenditures the gentleman from Indiana makes the insulting insinuation that they are "demagogues" and men who want to talk back to their districts. I do not know of any finer campaign material for the other side than that which was furnished by the gentleman from Indiana when he was arraigning those who were objecting to the reconditioning of the Leviathan. I know something about that vessel. She is 968 feet long, if I remember right, and about 100 feet wide. She is a stable ship. She would make a splendid airplane carrier. She probably could be turned into an airplane carrier without expending the five millions, as the Shipping Board proposes to expend in order to fit her as a passenger ship. But whether that is done or not, we could save upwards of $10,000,000 if, instead of putting this ship into the passenger service after an expenditure of $8,000,000, we made her into an airplane carrier.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss again the question of whether the Leviathan can ever operate at a profit in the passenger traffic. I shall be content to leave to the final result and the figures that will in time be given, the decision of whether or not the Leviathan will ever be made to pay, and whether we can get even $6,000,000 for her after paying out $8,000,000 to recondition her.

The gentleman from Indiana referred me to page 1129 of the hearings for the comparative expenses of other vessels in the transatlantic service. There was no such comparison there, although the gentleman said if I could not find it I was lost to reason and persuasion. When we propose to authorize the Emergency Fleet Corporation to spend millions of dollars in lump sums of one or more millions, it is time their proposals should be considered fully and fairly, and it is time they should be considered on their merits. Objections should be met by arguments and not by the kind of talk indulged in by the gentleman from Indiana. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Indiana desire recognition?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman in discussing this bill will discuss the matter before us and not distract attention from the matter immediately before us by talking about something else. The question is whether or not the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] should be adopted. I thought the same amendment had been offered the other day, but by this amendment he confesses being wrong then by raising the limit $100,000. This matter has been gone over time and again, and I therefore ask for a vote on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 60.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish the gentleman would wait for some other time. We have been over a week in the debate on this bill thus far. We want to make progress and conclude it. I hate to object to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, but I think we should proceed in order. I will not object to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee, but I will serve notice now that hereafter during the consideration of this bill we shall confine ourselves to the discussion of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to submit some remarks and general observations on the subject of the observance of law and order.

I think the condition of the country now is such that there is no subject of more vital importance than a due regard for law and a faithful observance and obedience to legislation, and especially is that true with reference to the persons in authority, persons who stand well in the community.

It is sometimes asked if we should do wrong that good may result, or that if the law should be violated in order to accomplish some good purpose? I think that the consensus of good opinion is that it should not. The answer, I think, is in the negative, and that the law should be observed and legislation should be obeyed.

Having this mind, I recall that in 1909 Congress passed legislation on this subject to which I desire to call attention at the present time. In the sundry civil appropriation act of March 4, 1909, Statutes at Large, volume 35, page 1027, section 9, we find the following:

SEC. 9. That hereafter no part of the public moneys, or of any appropriation heretofore or hereafter made by Congress, shall be used for the payment of compensation or expenses of any commission, council, board, or other similar body, or any members thereof, or for expenses in connection with any work or the results of any work or action of any commission, council, board, or other similar body, unless the creation of the same shall be or shall have been authorized by law, nor shall there be employed by detail hereafter or heretofore made or other personal services from any executive department or other Government establishment in connection with any such commission, council, board, or other similar body.

Those of us who were in the House at that time know why that legislation was enacted. It was to put a stop to promiscuous boards and commissions without authority of law and without the consent of the Congress.

It will be noted that the first part of this legislation prohibits the use of appropriations to pay any boards or commissions or councils or the expenses thereof and that the second portion of it prohibits the employment or detail of personal services from any executive department or Government establishment in connection with any such commission, council, board, or other similar body. I want to call attention to the fact that on August 25, 1921, in circular No. 26, by direction of the President, and Charles G. Dawes, Director of the Bureau of the Budget, the Federal Liquidation Board was created.

October 10, 1921, in a similar manner, in circular No. 41, the Federal Traffic Board was organized and created.

October 10, in circular No. 42, the Federal Specifications Board was created.

November 22, 1921, in circular No. 47, the Interdepartmental Board of Contract and Adjustment was created.

December 23, 1921, in circular No. 52, the Federal Personnel Board was created.

August 25, 1921, in circular No. 25, the Federal Purchasing Board was created.

All of these boards are given supervisory control and given authority to deal with questions and to exercise authority and jurisdiction, and created as far as I have been able to find—and I have made some search in the matter in order to ascertain—without the authority of Congress and in direct contravention of this express statute that was placed upon the statute books by Congress in order to inhibit the creation of boards of this kind and character.

Mr. KING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PADGETT. Yes.

Mr. KING. Was there any violation of this law prior to the time stated by the gentleman from Tennessee; and if so, by whom?

Mr. PADGETT. That may be. I have not looked into that. I do not know. But I do know that one wrong does not justify another and two wrongs do not create one right.

Mr. KING. I simply wanted to know what the precedent for it was.

Mr. PADGETT. There may have been a precedent, but if it has been created heretofore, now is the time to stop it; now is the time to call attention to it and now is the time to emphasize the importance and the necessity of observance of the law; and the more important it is for the higher ones in authority to have respect for the will of Congress as expressed in its legislation and obedience to the law of the land as an example to others and for the good influence that it may have in instilling into the public thought and inspiring in public action regard for law and obedience to good government. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Not more than 13 officers or employees, including 7 attorneys, of the United States Shipping Board or the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation shall be paid an annual salary or compensation in excess of $11,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee: Page 29, line 7, strike out the word "thirteen" and insert the word "six," and strike out the words "including seven attorneys," in lines 7 and 8.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, it will be recalled that when the deficiency bill was under consideration in August last the House, at the instance of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], adopted a provision providing that not more than three officers or employees of the Shipping Board should be employed at a salary exceeding $12,000. Later on the bill passed the Senate with this provision eliminated, and as finally enacted it provided that not more than six officers or employees should be employed at a salary exceeding $11,000.

I understand from the hearings that at the present time there are employed by the Shipping Board two officers or employees at $35,000 a year each, one at $30,000 a year, two at $25,000 a year each, and one, if I remember correctly, at $20,000 a year in addition to the seven members of the Shipping Board who under the statute draw $12,000 a year each. This amendment if adopted will simply continue the law as it is now written, so that all of those officers or employees who are now employed at salaries exceeding $11,000 may continue in their employment. The pending bill provides that there shall be 13 officers or employees at a salary exceeding $11,000, 7 of whom shall be attorneys. In other words, the pending bill proposes to give to the Shipping Board the authority to employ seven attorneys at a salary exceeding $11,000 a year.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. MANN. What is the highest salary now paid to an attorney?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If I remember correctly, the highest salary now paid to an attorney is $11,000. There are now 15 attorneys employed at $11,000 a year. We have been told by the general counsel of the Shipping Board just how many of these attorneys were selected. The general counsel did not go into the States and pick good lawyers from the country at large, but he tells us that he went to the city of New York and talked there to such firms as Stanchfield & Levi, and to Mr. Root's firm, and other big corporation firms and asked them to suggest attorneys to be employed by the Shipping Board. We know that prior to the enactment of this provision he was paying $25,000 to one or two attorneys, that he was paying $20,000 to another, that he was paying $15,000 to several, and yet it is a singular fact that after this provision was incorporated into the law every one of those attorneys continued to work for the Shipping Board at a salary of $11,000 a year, and they are now so employed. And I take it that if this provision is adopted the Shipping Board will not lose the services of a single attorney who is now employed. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] had something to say upon this subject when it was under consideration in August last, and I want to read to you a part of his remarks, because he discussed the situation and salaries paid much more clearly and forcibly than I possibly can discuss it.

Mr. WOOD said this:

Gentlemen who have charge of the administration of the Government ought to welcome constructive criticism. It certainly would be helpful to them. I am criticizing and will continue to criticize this board for the exorbitant fees they are proposing to pay, unjustifiable, in my opinion. I maintain that instead of paying these men $25,000 or $35,000 a year as expert lawyers, they could have gone into the State of Virginia, the State of Indiana, the State of Illinois, or almost any State, into any town of 5,000 inhabitants, and could have gotten men who have never received $10,000 a year in their lives, who are as good if not better lawyers than any of the high-priced gentlemen who have been selected. They are paying these men simply because they happen to apply to some high-priced firm with an established reputation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Those remarks occur on page 4934 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I had occasion to say the other day that the Shipping Board in the matter of fixing salaries had absolutely run riot in the amounts fixed. I call attention to some of the salaries and the increases which appear from these hearings, brought out by the gentleman from Indiana, with particular reference to the salaries being paid attorneys by the Shipping Board. You will find that there is a man named Sharkey who in 1917, according to the gentleman from Indiana, was drawing $1,200 a year, who is now on the salary roll at $3,600 a year. There is a man named Tanner, who in 1917 was drawing $1,000 a year, who is now drawing $3,900 a year. There is a man named Jackson, who in 1919 was drawing $2,100 a year, and is now drawing $5,000 a year. A man named Gendron was drawing $1,000 a year in 1919, and has now been promoted and is drawing $6,000 a year. There is a man named Annewalt who in 1919 was drawing $2,100 a year and who is now drawing $4,800 a year. There is a man named Martin who in 1919 was drawing $1,500 a year who is now drawing $4,200 a year. A man named Bowen was drawing $4,000 a year in 1919 and is now drawing $7,500 a year. A man named Fairbanks, the hearings show, a short while ago, in a small Vermont town, was making from $3,000 to $5,000 a year as an attorney, and he is now drawing $11,000 a year as attorney for the Shipping Board. A man named Aron was drawing $4,000 a year a short while ago and is now drawing $10,000 a year. A man named Laws, only a few years ago in the Department of Justice was drawing a salary of $2,500, and he is now getting $10,000 a year. A man named Fitch in 1917 was drawing $1,500 a year and is now drawing $3,900 a year. Massey in 1917 drew $1,500 a year and now gets $3,600.

Mr. Schlesinger, the general counsel, says that it is a crime that Mr. Fitch is not drawing more than $3,900 a year at the present time. The gentleman from Indiana, in the course of the hearings, very properly asked him what kind of a crime was being perpetrated in 1917 when Mr. Fitch was drawing only $1,500 a year.

That is a list of some of the attorneys who are being employed by the Shipping Board, and yet we are asked by this provision in this bill to give the general counsel the right to employ seven attorneys at salaries exceeding $11,000 a year. There is no limit as to what he may pay them. The sky is the limit. He may make it $15,000, $20,000, or $25,000 if he chooses, because we are appropriating the money here in the sum of $50,000,000, part of which is to be placed at his disposal in employment of attorneys.

It was said the other day that a former Member of this House from the State of Kentucky, Mr. Caleb Powers, whom we all know studied law only two or three years ago while serving as a Member of this House, has been put on the salary roll at $5,000 a year. It was disclosed in August last that a former distinguished Member of this House, who served a number of years, from West Virginia, and who since 1912 had been out of a Government job, as soon as this new Shipping Board was named was promptly employed at a salary of $9,500 a year. When Mr. Schlesinger was asked what his duties were, he said it was to appear before the committees of the House on behalf of the Shipping Board and to prepare such amendments as the Shipping Board might desire to the shipping law.

Eleven thousand dollars a year is sufficient, as the gentleman from Indiana says, to procure the very best talent, and if the general counsel, instead of going to important corporation firms in the city of New York, will go out into the country, into Indiana, Virginia, Tennessee, and other States and get his lawyers, he will be able to get good ones for much less than $10,000 a year. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I remember very well the speech the gentleman from Tennessee has called attention to. I have never said and will never say that the salaries paid to some of these gentlemen are not abnormally high. I do wish to bring to your attention, however, the evidence that came before your committee. It is not evidence of a weak man nor of a fool that he sometimes changes his ideas about existing conditions. We had a terrible catastrophe here in this city on Saturday night. It beggars description. I have heard people who arrived there immediately thereafter tell about the confusion and the excitement and how because of the lack of some executive head to immediately assume command many lives were probably lost. Differentiated only in degree is the situation with reference to the Shipping Board. I was appalled when I heard a description of what confronts these gentlemen. I made the speech referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee during the consideration of the deficiency appropriation bill, when I confess that I had no idea of the enormity of the situation.

I know you gentlemen on the Democratic side do not want to cripple the possibilities of this concern. I believe if you will read the hearings you, too, will have a different viewpoint from that expressed by some gentlemen. You should be at least charitable upon your side. This administration had to shoulder a great burden, which you placed upon it when you were in authority. I am not criticizing because of the fact that I know that because of the waste and graft and such things that come with war while you were in charge these things happened, but, nevertheless, it remains for this administration to clear up the débris, to save that which is worth saving, and to consign to oblivion at the same time that which we desire to forget. I have repeatedly called attention to the fact that there are more than $300,000,000 worth of claims outstanding against this institution, not of the creation of the present board, created by the past administration, which must be determined some way or other. I know we are confronted politically, when the opportunity affords itself, to take advantage of the party that is charged with responsibility. Some gentlemen, I fear, are trying to go a little along that line.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Does not the gentleman believe that with a salary of $7,500 a year he could go to Indiana or Texas or Virginia and get strong men, able men, young men, not connected with any of this business, who would give their whole time to it and as much ability as he can get anywhere?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will agree with the gentleman absolutely. I think we have good lawyers in my community. I think we have got them in every State in the Union who are not only the peers but the superiors of many of these men who seem to be drawing these large salaries. But listen: You can not get a man down in Texas who is getting $5,000 a year under a salary contract to give that up and come up here and temporarily connect himself with these salaries because of the fact that he is surrendering what he has got there, and you know if you and I went back to our habitats and tried to pick up the strings of our practice we gave up when we came here we would find the boys have got them, and we will never get them again. That is the sacrifice which the gentleman and myself have made. There is much in the argument that these men are gathered here temporarily——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are gathered here but temporarily, and if the gentleman who is responsible for this legal department knows what he is talking about he is insisting that if this organization of his is not broken up that he will take and reduce it one-half by the 1st day of January next, so that we ought really to take a chance and let him be responsible rather than take it ourselves, even admitting, and I am going to agree with all the gentleman says that these salaries seem exorbitant, and are and would be if they were connected with a permanent or ordinary business.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. MANN How will it break up the organization not to increase the salaries which those now are at present receiving?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to explain that. As I stated before, we have got $300,000,000 worth of these claims. The dockets in many of the courts are filled up with Government claims without sufficient Government lawyers to take care of them. I wish to call attention to one statement. The gentleman from Tennessee called attention to a man by the name of Aron. We inquired into what these men were doing. I called attention in the examination to a man by the name of Aron, and Mr. Schlesinger said:

> He was earning $15,000 or $16,000 a year. He was recommended highly. I had never seen him before in my life, but his record was fine. Mr. Aron was handling 37 receiverships in New York, which have all been consolidated into one. There was an annual expense of $500,000 a year to the Shipping Board in those receiverships, and he has reduced it to $50,000 by consolidating them. He has 1,500 claims in those receivership cases under his jurisdiction, and in addilton to that he and one other man, Mr. Brewster, are handling every one of the labor claims that come before the Construction Claims Commission.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will.

Mr. ZIHLMAN The gentleman from Tennessee stated these attorneys were employed on the recommendation of leading law firms in New York. Has the gentleman any information as to the appointment of these special experts and special counsels of the $10,000 class?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Schlesinger states it very fully. He was trying to get men fit for exceptional places where these peculiar character of claims were to come up. He tried to get the advice of those who were in a position to know where he could find them, and I do not think that any one would charge that there is any scandal or slander——

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Has the gentleman any information concerning one B. J. Laws, who was formerly stenographer to a Member of this House and is receiving $10,000 a year as special counsel?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not know anything about the case.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. I can say to the gentleman that he was appointed from the District of Columbia, and he was formerly stenographer in the district attorney's office here and is now listed as receiving $10,000 a year.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. One gentleman was referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], Mr. Fairbanks. These gentlemen, and I have no apologies to makes for them, came here and took whatever office they could, say a $2,000 position, because it was a bombproof place. After the danger was over they branched out into these places. I say I am not defending them at all.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I know the gentleman is himself a very able lawyer, and I agree with him that no one should wish to cripple the Shipping Board; but can the gentleman out of his knowledge of the situation give us some statement of a typical case, a sort of a case that the lawyers are called upon to handle, taking a fairly average case, or perhaps a case that is more than ordinarily complicated? I would like to ascertain whether cases are of such sort as to require the employment of the high-priced lawyers who are now engaged, or whether they could not be taken care of just as the gentleman said a few months ago, by such lawyers as you can easily find in Indiana and in many other States of the Union?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I will state in answer to the gentleman from Virginia that Mr. Schlesinger does give a number of those concrete cases, and also because the number of cases that were allocated to these different men who are in charge of these defenses, and the fact that they have to contend with the biggest lawyers, the largest concerns, representing the largest corporations in the United States, men who are receiving salaries incomparable to the salaries received by these men, that is another thing that enters into the equation.

Now, I wish to speak directly with reference to the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not true that a number of attorneys have to be employed to handle suits in admiralty, which is specialized work?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes. That is the crux of this proposed increase. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, if adopted, would leave the law exactly as it is now. The only thing that is attempted by this committee is to recommend that there be an employment of seven additional men in the legal department. And we have tried to show you the reason why. As suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts—and I desire the attention of the gentleman from Virginia on this proposition, for he can appreciate it—the reason for this recommendation is in the fact that the hearings disclose that in the admiralty courts, where the great number of these claims are now pending and must be determined within a very reasonable length of time, we are utterly unprepared to cope with gentlemen found on the other side. Now, then, this proposition is, if it is adopted, that there will be seven additional lawyers employed at a salary not to exceed $15,000. Some of them might be less than $15,000, but the aggregate of the staff would not exceed an average of $15,000. It is for the reason that we have claims amounting into the millions which depend, if you please, upon not only the erudition but upon the ability of a man as the practitioner by reason of his acquaintance with the court, by reason of his association with the lawyers who are retained on the other side, and we all know there is much in it, and that is one of the things that might be contended. You can take a lawyer from Texas who knows more about general law than these experts, but if you throw him suddenly into this vortex he is lost until he can accustom himself to his new environment. And then this thing is not going to last over six or seven months, and why should we take a chance on breaking up the machine which these men say they are going to bring to a successful conclusion?

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER. If this passes, as the gentleman has recommended it, there will be retained in the services at the higher salaries men who are now in the service.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Schlesinger tells us that a number of these men were employed at a larger salary, but by reason of the amendment they were reduced to $11,000, and some have quit and some intend to quit. Their places have to be filled. Some of these men would not even stay if they were awarded a higher salary, I am told—and I must depend on what they tell me, for I have not seen them. But even with this increase they would have to get other men, and that makes it all the harder, for strangers must be put into their places. And it is all the more essential that experts who can handle this business should really be put into those places.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana in opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] says that we do not appreciate the organization that was turned over to the present board; that things were in a deplorable condition. Now, admitting that that is true, he wants you to believe that you can remedy this deplorable condition by maintaining in the legal department of the Shipping Board the lawyers who were there during all the time when this deplorable condition was brought about, and simply increasing their salaries. The gentleman from Tennessee read to you the name of lawyer after lawyer who has been in the Shipping Board for two and three years, and who is there to-day. If the legal department is in a bad fix they are responsible for it. And this present board, instead of getting rid of those men whose incompetency you have criticized and now criticize, proposes to remedy it by simply paying them more money for their services.

One or two illustrations ought to be given you. The gentleman from Tennessee referred to the case of Mr. Gaines, who is on the roll at $9,500 a year, and concerning whom Mr. Lasker testified in August. Mr. Lasker said:

> You gentlemen probably do not realize it, but we have meetings of the Merchant Marine Committees of the House and Senate probably two or three times a week. New legislation is coming up every day, and we are called upon to be present at those meetings and to express what we think the legislation ought to be, or draft new bills or to modify bills and other similar matters. We employ Mr. Gaines to have charge of that work.

In other words, to be informed of the times when the Merchant Marine Committees of the House and Senate meet, the gentleman is employed at $9,500 a year.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. I do not recall that Mr. Gaines ever appeared before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. He was not employed to appear; he was employed to advise the Shipping Board when the committee did meet. [Laughter.]

As to Mr. Massey, the gentleman from Indiana referred to him, and the gentleman from Massachusetts asked if it was necessary to employ an admiralty lawyer. Of course it is. Mr. Massey is an admiralty lawyer. He was employed at first at $1,500 by this old corrupt board, but when this present economical and efficient board came in they continued to retain the services of this man who had served during all that rottenness and corruption, and increased his salary to $3,600. I read from the hearings on page 1112:

> Mr. WOOD. Do you not think that it would have been a good idea to have changed a lot of those people? The thing was so rotten at that time that a change could not have hurt.
> Mr. SCHLESINGER. He is needed in the department where he works, and he is a good admiralty lawyer.
> Mr. WOOD. Is he an admiralty lawyer?
> Mr. SCHLESINGER. Yes, sir; and he has a number of cases. Let me read you what he has.
> Mr. WOOD. He comes from Oklahoma.

[Laughter.]

An admiralty lawyer from Oklahoma was something new to the gentleman from Indiana, and he is something new to me. But he received $1,500 under this old and extravagant board, and this present economical and highly efficient board increased the salary of this admiralty lawyer to $3,600.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Is it not true that admiralty trial lawyers get usually from $3,600 to $5,000 a year?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I presume their compensation varies. Here is another one, a Mr. Hallett, another admiralty lawyer on this force. Quoting again from the hearing, Mr. WOOD, who can express himself very forcibly at times, could not express himself more forcibly than when he said this:

> They had him down here at the War Risk Bureau, until it was perfectly patent that they had to let him go. They did let him go, and he fell out of these into your lap, either at the same salary or at a bigger one.

[Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Now, this admiralty lawyer, who was discharged by the War Risk Bureau, according to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], waltzes over to the Shipping Board and enters its service at an increased salary. The truth is that any man connected with any one of the governmental departments during the last year, or who is now connected with them, who has ever had a certificate as a lawyer and who does not go over to the Shipping Board and get a big salary is not doing justice either to himself or to his family, because all he has to do is to apply. [Laughter.] Yet we are told by the gentleman from Indiana that the Shipping Board needs this money to employ these high-priced lawyers.

I challenge any man to look at this record and say how much they need for their legal department. If you will look on page 1127, you will find that Mr. Powell, who submitted a statement from the comptroller's office, says that they need for "other expenses" $514,000, and he goes on to say that under this item of "other expenses" they will spend more money for special counsel, and he wants a total of $1,400,000 for the legal department. He stated they wanted $963,000 for "salaries and wages" and $514,000 for "other expenses," making a total of $1,400,000. On the same page he says he wants only $700,000 for salaries.

Now, if you will turn to Mr. Schlesinger's testimony, on page 1121, you will find that he says:

I think we ought to have $600,000 for the attorneys alone, and no increase in the clerical force.

They do not agree among themselves except in one thing, and that is that they want to have the right to pay high salaries to these men. Now look at the Claims Commission. Four of them are laymen. They state that they need admiralty lawyers. Everybody knows that when they employed Mr. Massey, an admiralty lawyer from Oklahoma, and Mr. Caleb Powers, of Kentucky, they are as well equipped to try admiralty cases as a New York lawyer would be to try a replevin case about a mule. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think that considering the comparisons which the gentleman is making between Oklahoma and Kentucky lawyers we ought to have a real admiralty lawyer?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I quoted what the gentleman stated. I know that the Oklahoma lawyer probably knows no more about admiralty law than a New York lawyer knows about the replevining of a mule. Our friend from Indiana has always advocated economy. He has done so until this Shipping Board cast its spell over him. Now he has raised the limit and even violated the rule that we had agreed upon, not to exceed the Budget estimates, because, as I shall show you, when the estimate of the Shipping Board came before our committee, through the Budget Bureau, they wanted only $50,000,000, and then in January they submitted a supplemental estimate of $50,000,000. That estimate was transmitted through the Budget Bureau, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] said, "You have not got anything on me. I can be as liberal as you, and I will give them the right to use $55,000,000 from sale of assets." So that when the Budget Bureau sends a total estimate here of $100,000,000, this bill seeks to go them $55,000,000 better than the Budget Bureau asks for. Does their record justify it?

When every page of the testimony contains statements of the raising of salaries of men from $1,500 and $2,000 to $8,000 and $10,000, when they are spending money as no agency of the Government has ever spent money, do you now propose to increase the number of men who are to receive these large salaries? Do you know what will happen? Just what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] indicated. They are not going to get any big lawyers around the country and pay them $15,000. They are simply going to raise the salaries of six or seven lawyers who are now in the legal department of the Shipping Board, and take some more of the law clerks who are receiving $1,500 and $2,000 and increase them to $8,000 and $10,000 a year.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has again expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I desire to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] a few questions. What machinery has been set up by the Shipping Board to take care of these claims?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They have allocated the claims to the different heads of their legal department. I have before me a statement of the heads of the departments to which they have been sent, and I have also a statement showing the number of claims that each one of them has.

Mr. SWEET. How many claims are there?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There are more than 3,000.

Mr. SWEET. And the amount of these claims is how much?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. About $300,000,000.

Mr. SWEET. About $291,000,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. More than that, practically $300,000,000.

Mr. SWEET. I have before me the statement that was made to the Senate. Now they have set up some kind of a board or commission down there, have they not, to pass on these claims?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. And that board is mainly constituted of attorneys, is it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; there is only one attorney on it. They have one attorney, one practical shipbuilding man, one material man, one business man, one operator. The board is composed of five men, but there is only one practicing lawyer who is a member of it.

Mr. SWEET. All these claims do not go through this commission, do they?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, no. The great bulk of this legal work for which we are asking these additional attorneys is for trial attorneys.

Mr. SWEET. That is the point I am after.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Some of these men have 50 or 60 cases assigned to them involving millions of dollars, and the gentleman knows as a lawyer that one man can not take care of that many cases and do each one of them justice in six months' time.

Mr. SWEET. This bill carries an appropriation of $50,000,000 to pay these claims.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; not these claims. The $50,000,000 that is carried here is for the purpose of adjusting those claims that may be agreed upon between the Shipping Board and the claimants, through the attorneys of this claims commission.

Mr. SWEET. The Shipping Board has settled some $522,000,000 of claims, has it not, for $140,000,000? I was wondering how you arrived at the $50,000,000 to settle these claims, whether it was an estimate based on what had been settled.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. It is an estimate, and some pains has been taken, as I stated the other day. I am sorry the gentleman was not here——

Mr. SWEET. I was here when the gentleman made his statement, but it was not very clear to me at the time.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. There are a lot of these concerns that are anxious to get their money, and they would be perfectly willing to accept a great deal less now than they might possibly recover if their claims were left to go through the claims courts; and unless there is some authority given to the Shipping Board to settle these claims they must take their course through the claims courts, which may mean three or four or five years. Nobody knows how long that will take.

Mr. SWEET. The claims that the gentleman says amount to about $300,000,000 have been filed largely within the last three years—that is, in 1919, 1920, and up to September 30, 1921. I find that there were 2 claims filed in 1917, 10 in 1918, and the balance of these claims have been filed during 1919, 1920, and up to September 30, 1921. Those are not war claims, are they?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; every one of them is a war claim.

Mr. SWEET. How far back do they go?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They go back to the commencement of the war. The gentleman will understand that the Shipping Board was not created until 1916 and the Emergency Fleet Corporation after the war commenced, and all of these claims grow out of contracts either express or implied that originated by reason of the war.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Do these claims include some of the claims made by the builders of wooden ships, who relied upon some sort of a nebulous promise alleged to have been made by Mr. Hurley, which he denies?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Those are included?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are included in the $300,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. And they are to be taken care of out of this $50,000,000, are they?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; they are not.

Mr. SWEET. I do not understand just what this $50,000,000 is intended to pay. I notice from the statement made that these claims are required to go to the Court of Claims unless this $50,000,000 is appropriated. I should like to know just what claims are to be paid out of the $50,000,000, if they are not war claims.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They are war claims. I will tell you what they propose to settle out of the $50,000,000. They are claims about which there is little or no dispute. Many millions of dollars of them have been adjusted, and they would be perfectly willing to make settlements now if there was any way to settle them.

There is not one of these claims about which there is any serious doubt and concerning which there is even the taint of fraud which they propose to settle out of the $50,000,000.

Mr. SWEET. Have these claims been listed?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. Is there any place where we can find them? Looking through this report made to the Senate in Document 103——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have my time extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. In looking over this report I do not find any separate list of claims here that ought to be covered by the $50,000,000.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If the gentleman will examine the hearings before the committee he will find this. Document 103 comprises all of the claims.

Mr. SWEET. Yes; but it also comprises claims now against the Shipping Board in the ordinary run of business.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct.

Mr. SWEET. And $50,000,000 here appropriated in this bill is for taking care of those current claims, is it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No. The $50,000,000 appropriated here is not appropriated for that purpose. Fifty million dollars are appropriated for satisfying whatever deficit may occur by reason of the operation of the business.

Mr. SWEET. That is to pay current claims, is it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; that is to pay operating expenses.

Mr. SWEET. No claims at all?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. SWEET. Then, there is in this bill only $50,000,000 to pay back claims?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct.

Mr. SWEET. And claims which they have practically agreed upon.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That is correct.

Mr. SWEET. Does that explain why these claims are brought up to the 30th day of December, 1921?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That may be or may not be the explanation. Here is what has transpired: The Shipping Board ever since this present administration has been trying to get everybody to submit his claim. They have been submitting all kinds of claims. There are good claims, bad claims, padded claims, and every character of claim. This legal department, I expect, to-day is charged with more responsibility than other portions of this organization for the reason that they have the deadwood with which to contend, and these claims that grew out of the war by reason of the speculation and everything that was rife during the war has made it harder for them to determine.

Mr. SWEET. I realize that; and right in that connection the settlement of these claims is left largely to their judgment.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. As the settlement of claims of a business concern.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Absolutely.

Mr. SWEET. And they are not hampered by provisions of law in any way, because there is no law in existence by which they can be governed in the settlement of a claim; and if they pass on a claim and say that it is equitable and just, and recommend its payment, it is paid, is it not?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No.

Mr. SWEET. Where is the law on the proposition that governs them any more than governs the President or the officers of a private concern?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman has often said that this is a great business concern.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. These attorneys in passing on these claims pass upon them in the ordinary way as they believe the law to be in dealing with a great business, but if they make a mistake in the claim and approve it, in that event the claim is paid.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; but, of course, the Supreme Court has made mistakes itself.

Mr. SWEET. Oh, it is so much easier to get a claim settled with attorneys than it would probably be to submit it to the Supreme Court, because the Supreme Court would be governed—for they would determine it according to provisions of law, and, while attorneys may wrangle over these matters, the truth of it is that many settlements undoubtedly will be made here which would not meet the test of the courts.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. That may be true; but there has to be some human agency, and even if mistakes may be made we should take all of the equations into consideration.

Mr. SWEET. I can agree with the gentleman largely upon the question of business, but when you come to a payment of past claims, claims which go back into the war, I differ with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, in passing I would like to say that I regard Caleb Powers as one of the brightest men I have ever met. Joseph H. Gaines, who was employed by the Shipping Board to keep track of things going on in Congress, is one of the brightest men who ever came into this House, and in my judgment his was an eminently proper scope of employment.

I suppose it is a part of the partisan attack to attack these gentlemen.

I do not understand yet, and I have listened to this debate from the start, the necessity for increasing the pay of any of the attorneys of the Shipping Board. I have the highest respect for Mr. Schlesinger, the present general counsel, if that is the proper title, of the Shipping Board. They have a number of attorneys who are receiving salaries of $11,000 a year. I do not agree at all with my friend from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] or my friend from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and with many other country lawyers in the House, all of whom probably would express the same opinion, that some country lawyer, a fine man, well posted in the general practice of the law, is the proper man to select for the purpose of attending to the present work of the great Shipping Board. However, we now have a great organization of attorneys, the gentleman from Indiana tells us. Less than a year ago the House provided that there should be no one employed at an expense of over $12,000 a year except three. Afterwards we agreed with the Senate to employ six at salaries over $11,000 a year. The organization there is complete. What is the reason now why seven of these attorneys should have an increase in salary from $11,000 to $15,000 or $20,000 or $25,000 a year? It is true the employment is temporary. It is true also that lots of attorneys would like to receive this employment for the advertisement that goes with it the rest of their lives.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.
